Harvard College Library
THE GIFT OF
GINN AND COMPANY
The Lake English Classics

IVANHOE

BY

SIR WALTER SCOTT

EDITED FOR SCHOOL USE

BY

WILLIAM EDWARD SIMONDS, PH.D.

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, KNOX COLLEGE,

GALESBURG, ILLINOIS.

CHICAGO

SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY

1901
PREFACE

In presenting this edition of Ivanhoe for the use of pupils in secondary schools, the editor has sought to provide such information, and only such information, as seems necessary to its appreciation by boys and girls. In annotating, most foreign terms and most technical and obsolete words have been explained. In many instances a brief statement of the etymology of the word has been added, not only because the historical development of words is in itself a legitimate branch of study, but also because, when the derivation can be traced, it constitutes an essential part of the definition and fixes the significance of the word in memory as nothing else will. Ivanhoe is particularly rich in words that illustrate the historical development of English in one of its most important phases—its relation to the Norman-French. It is with reference to the use of the notes for an occasional study of these etymologies as well as for convenience ordinarily, that the "Index of Words Annotated" has been prepared.

The breadth of Scott's vocabulary, his customary free and accurate selection of words, is one of the notable characteristics of his literary style. To illustrations of this and similar points of rhetorical criticism it is the province of the teacher, not the editor, to direct attention. There is no difficulty in providing material for study in connection with a work like this; the difficulty rather is to make that material as condensed as possible and of interest sufficient to tempt the average boy or girl to use it. By all means let the reading of the novel itself precede formal study of the introduction.

13
The writer wishes to acknowledge his indebtedness to the excellent edition of Ivanhoe prepared by Professor I Perry of Princeton University, whose admirable choice arrangement of matter has been of frequent service in preparation of this text.

Galesburg, Ill., August 15, 1899.
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ACE</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTRODUCTION</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I. Biographical Sketch</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II. The Study of the Novel</td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Biographical Sketch</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of Characters</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ATALOGICAL TABLE</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INDEX: Author's Notes</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>x of Words Annotated</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INDEX: Author's Notes</td>
<td>612</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>x of Words Annotated</td>
<td>617</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INTRODUCTION

1. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Ancestry. Walter Scott was born in Edinburgh, August 15, 1771. His father, whose name was also Walter, was a Writer to the Signet, or attorney at law. His paternal ancestry contained many famous names. One of the poet’s ancestors, likewise a Walter, commonly known as Auld Wat of Harden, is commemorated in The Lay of the Last Minstrel. Auld Wat’s son, William, having been made prisoner in one of the raids common enough in that day, was given his choice between hanging, and marrying a daughter of his captor, whose nickname of Meikle-Mouthed Meg is significant of her personal appearance. After three days of deliberation, this unwilling suitor chose the lady, and, as we are told, never had reason to regret his choice. Another Walter Scott, great grandfather of the novelist, was identified with the cause of the Stuarts, and it was from him, perhaps, that Sir Walter inherited that sentiment for the same cause so evident in his work. Scott’s father was a dignified and somewhat formal personage. He is portrayed in Redgauntlet in the character of Alexander Fairford. The mother of the novelist was Anne Rutherford Scott, daughter of a professor in the University of Edinburgh. She was well educated, a woman of kindly nature and warm heart.

Childhood. Walter was the ninth of twelve children, and although unusually strong and athletic when a man, he was sickly as a child. When two and a half years old, he was taken to his grandfather’s farm at Sandyknowe, where he remained under the special care of his grandmother for several years. One of the old servants on the place afterward described him as "a sweet-tempered bairn, a darling with all about the house." Here the child grew rapidly strong, and although lame, he could clamber about with agility, and even while very young learned to gallop about the country on a small Shetland pony of his own. Amid such surroundings Scott’s taste for the ancient literature of his native Scotland developed early and was fostered by all the circumstances of his environment. Under the direction of his grandmother, whose memory was a treasure-house of the past, he learned to read and to recite some of the old border-poems of which he grew passionately fond. On one occasion he declaimed the ballad of Hardicanute with such gusto that he quite put out the parish clergyman, who complained that he "might as well speak in a cannon's mouth as where that child was." The vivid imagination of the romancer was manifested in the boy and roused the astonishment of his friends. A relative of the family saw him when six years old reading to his mother, and describes him thus: "He was reading a poem to his mother when I went in. I made him read on; it was the description of a shipwreck. His passion rose with the storm. 'There's the mast gone,' says he; 'crash it goes; they will all perish.' After his agitation he turns to me, 'That is too melancholy,' says he; 'I had better read you something more amusing.'"

_Schooldays._ In 1779 the eight-year-old lad came back to Edinburgh and was placed in the High School, where he made less of a reputation as a scholar than as a teller of tales to his comrades in the school. The spirit of his rough and ready ancestry was not wanting in the youth; he was a good fighter on occasion and bold enough in all boyish adventure. Although, as he says, he "glanced like a meteor from one end of the class to the other," meaning thereby a movement in the wrong direction, it is not to be inferred that he was either a dunce or an idler. With the books that he enjoyed he grew more than familiar. He absorbed the spirit as well as the words of the authors he loved.
Something of their enthusiasm and something of their prejudice he assimilated also. Even as a boy Scott was a stanch, unyielding Tory, and took the side of the Cavaliers as against the Roundheads, from a conviction that their creed was “the more gentlemanlike” of the two. Such were the characteristics of this precocious lad; it is not difficult to see in them the possibility and promise of a Marmion and an Ivanhoe.

Professional Career. About 1785 or 1786 Scott entered his father’s office to study law, supplementing his office-study with courses in the law-school of the University.
He worked on thus for six or seven years, with more or less perseverence, though with no great enthusiasm for his profession. As occasion offered the young attorney made excursions into the Highlands and met some of the characters afterward introduced in the tales. He also joined the yeomanry, or militia, and thus gained acquaintance with military matters. In 1792 he was admitted to the bar.

On Christmas eve, 1797, the young advocate was mar-rried to Miss Charlotte Margaret Carpenter, or Charpentier, as the name originally stood, a lady of French parentage, although reared and educated in England. Soon afterward Scott was made sheriff of Selkirkshire and rented Ashestiel, a country-house on the Tweed. In 1806 he assumed the duties of one of the Clerks of Session, but did not enjoy the salary of this office, £1300, until 1811.

Literary Labors. Scott’s entrance upon a literary career began with the publication of some translations from the newer romantic poetry of Germany. In 1799 he published a version of Goethe’s Goetz von Berlichingen. In 1800 he wrote the Eve of St. John, a border ballad, and in 1805 appeared his first poem of note, The Lay of the Last Minstrel. This was followed by Marmion, in 1808; The Lady of the Lake, in 1810; The Vision of Don Roderick, 1811, and Rokeby, 1813. But this was not all: along with other poems of lesser note, Scott also did an extraordinary amount of editorial work during this period, including editions, with biographies, of Dryden and Swift. His metrical romances, the best of their kind ever written, made their author the most popular writer of his day. The history of the Scottish borders was rich in material suited to the purpose of the romancer, and Scott, thoroughly familiar with the customs and traditions of his native land, happily endowed with a sentiment and a sympathy for his subject, was remarkably well qualified to thus revive the spirit of the past. The poet found himself famous and wealthy. In 1811 he bought Abbotsford—forever afterward associated with his name—an estate on the banks of the Tweed about thirty miles from Edinburgh.

The Novels. In 1812 Lord Byron published the first two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, and followed these in the next year with The Giaour and The Bride of Abydos. There was therefore now a new poet in the field. Rokeby had not proved so successful as the earlier poems, and after two further ventures in The Bridal of Triermain, 1813, and The Lord of the Isles, 1815, Scott quietly withdrew from the field of verse and opened a vein of imaginative creation the like of which had never before been discovered in English literature. In 1814 appeared Waverley: or, 'Tis Sixty Years Since, a novel of manners and adventure in Scotland during the period indicated by the title. This was indeed an event in English letters, and the "author of Waverley," who rigorously concealed his identity until secrecy finally became impossible, found himself for a second time the success of the hour. Guy Mannering followed in 1815, "the work of six weeks at Christmas time;" then came in quick succession The Antiquary, The Black Dwarf, Old Mortality, all in 1816. Rob Roy, The Heart of Midlothian, 1817, The Bride of Lammermoor, and The Legend of Montrose, 1819. During This last year the novelist suffered intensely with a malady of the stomach which caused an agony of pain, "but," as he wrote afterward to a friend, with reference to his sufferings at this time, "I have no idea of these things preventing man from doing what he has a mind." When The Bride of Lammermoor was completed, however, Scott declared that he did not recollect one single incident, character or conversation it contained, so severe and so continuous had been the pain which had tormented him throughout its creation.

Ivanhoe. The year 1819 marks a slight departure in Scott's selection of subjects. Hitherto he had confined himself to the field of Scottish history and Scottish character, a field where he felt himself perfectly at home; he now tried an "experiment on a subject purely English," and with gratifying success. Ivanhoe, if not the greatest, is probably the most popular of all his works. As a romance of chivalry, picturesque, brilliant, absorbing, vivid in its portrayal of the jarring adjustment of Norman and Saxon, Ivanhoe remains, in spite of the criticism inspired by the melodrama of its action, unsurpassed by any work of fiction with which it can be appropriately compared. No one impressed by the scope of the imagination displayed in its pages, the rapidity of its movement or its freshness of tone, would suspect that the author while engaged upon its creation was racked with physical pain; yet such was the fact, for at the time of its creation Scott was still a sufferer from the malady already referred to.

It was Scott's plan to launch this "experiment" as the work of a novelist entirely unknown. He therefore adopted the device of a "dedicatory epistle" presenting his ideas on the handling of antiquarian material and signed by "Laurence Templeton." In the course of this epistle the writer says: "Of my materials I have but little to say. They may be chiefly found in the singular Anglo-Norman MS. which Sir Arthur Wardour preserves with such jealous care.*
in the third drawer of his oaken cabinet, scarcely allowing anyone to touch it, and being himself not able to read one syllable of its contents. I should never have got his consent, on my visit to Scotland, to read in those precious pages for so many hours, had I not promised to designate it by some emphatic mode of printing, as The Wardour Manuscript, giving it, thereby, an individuality as important as the Bannatyne MS., the Auchinleck MS., or any other monument of the patience of a Gothic Scrivener." This quotation will explain the notes signed "L. T." as well as the occasional allusions to the Wardour MS., a purely fictitious invention. In the preface to the edition of 1830 the author gives a number of interesting details concerning the real materials used in the novel. The name of "Ivanhoe" was suggested by an old rhyme recording the names of three manors forfeited by the ancestor of the celebrated Hampden, for striking the Black Prince a blow with his racket when they quarreled at tennis—

"Tring, Wing, and Ivanhoe,
For striking of a blow,
Hampden did forego,
And glad he could escape so."

The actual sources from which Scott drew the material of Ivanhoe, however, were in his own intimate acquaintance, not only with the facts of early English history, but as well with the spirit of her people in all ages of the past. With this substantial knowledge at his command, his masterly imagination seemed to have no difficulty in recalling the historical personages of whom he wrote and in reviving the spirit and manners of the age in which they lived, or in adding characters of his own invention to supplement and round out the little world of his romance.

Later Years. In 1820 Scott was made a baronet, the first person thus honored by George IV. after his accession to the throne. At Abbotsford he lived the life of a Scottish laird, hospitable, industrious, busying himself with official duties and displaying a capacity for work that has hardly been equaled. Along with memoirs, essays and translations, continued to appear the successive volumes of the Waverley novels, including Kenilworth, 1821, The Pirate, The Fortunes of Nigel, and Peveril of the Peak, 1822, Quentin Durward, 1823, St. Ronan’s Well, and Redgauntlet, 1824, The Betrothed, and The Talisman, 1825, and Woodstock, 1826.

This last year was a disastrous one for the Laird. In 1805 he had become a silent partner in the printing and publishing firm of the Ballantynes; he was also financially involved with Constable, the publisher of the novels. There was evident mismanagement on all sides, and in 1826 both firms collapsed, leaving Sir Walter under a load of debt which he bore heroically till his death. The amount of the obligations assumed by Scott was about £130,000. He turned over to trustees his property at Abbotsford and set bravely to work to discharge the debt. He was fifty-five years old and subject to the attacks of a new disorder, which struck at the brain and eventually caused paralysis. The story of the next few years is full of pathos. Within two years’ time he had earned nearly £40,000, £18,000 having come from the sales of a Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. In February, 1830, the novelist had a stroke of paralysis, but still he struggled on at his task. On September 23, 1831, too late to regain his shattered health, Scott left Abbotsford for a trip to Italy, seeking rest. He sailed from Portsmouth for the Mediterranean upon a frigate placed by the government at his disposal, visited Malta, Naples and Rome, and then began to long for home. In May the party started to return, traveling down the Rhine to Rotterdam, where the almost dying man was placed on an English steamboat, arriving in London June 13, 1832. Here he rallied and, though very weak, at his urgent desire was brought home to Abbotsford, recognizing familiar scenes.
INTRODUCTION

and greeting with a cry of delight the first view of its cherished towers. Foremost among the old friends eager to extend a greeting were his favorite dogs, and Sir Walter smiled or sobbed as they fawned about him and licked his hand.

Scott lived two months after his return. On September 17, in an interval of consciousness, he called his son-in-law to the bedside and said: "Lockhart, I may have but a minute to speak to you. My dear, be a good man, be virtuous—be religious—be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here."

Four days later, September 21, 1832, Sir Walter died. He was buried in Dryburgh Abbey where for many generations his ancestors had been laid. His death was regarded as a national loss and unprecedented honors were paid to his memory.

The terrible task, under the strain of which he at last succumbed, was not accomplished during the novelist's lifetime, although by his sacrificing labor the debt was reduced more than one-half in the six years of ceaseless toil. The remainder of the debt was more than covered by the royalties from his books and within a few years after his death Sir Walter's account was clear.

II. THE STUDY OF THE NOVEL.

So many inquiries are made by teachers and pupils concerning just what is meant by the phrase "a study of fiction" that the editor feels justified in commenting upon this point somewhat at length. It should be understood from the outset that what follows is intended to be suggestive only, and that the material offered in illustration is in no wise complete. The personal tastes and interests of teacher or student may very well modify the method of examination here used; the wider the reader's familiarity with general literature, the larger his practice in literary criticism, the more extended his knowledge of fact—the greater will be his independence in his application of tests to the material in hand and the more ample will be the results of his "study" of the work.

First of all, let the fact be emphasized that the novel or romance is created primarily not to be made an object of study, but to afford pleasure to its reader. In some works of fiction the purpose to entertain is more obvious than in others. In Ivanhoe, as in all of Scott's novels, that purpose is paramount, and our first reading of it should not be so minutely attentive to technical features that we shall be robbed of our entertainment and lose what was intended by the author, our pleasure in the story. And yet, as a matter of fact, that enjoyment will naturally be intensified if at the same time we feel the value of the work as a whole and note here and there the evidence of skillful construction and artistic effect. These waymarks of genius we may be conscious of as we pass and a more careful examination will increase our appreciation and heighten our pleasure. Herein is the justification for subsequent study of the work, a study which should result not only in a more intense feeling of the effects designed, but also to a greater or less degree in the apprehension of how those effects have been achieved.

The Setting and the Situation. In the study of any novel we may begin by noting the setting and the situation. The first has to do with the general environment, the characteristics of time and place, the date and scene of action; the second deals with the conditions which involve the principal persons in the narrative and presents the groundwork or starting-point from which the story springs. Either of these may be placed before the reader first, or something of both may be made to appear, the details of each unfolding coincidently. In what we may call the Introduction of Ivanhoe the principal points of the setting are clearly and briefly given in the first five paragraphs of chapter I, and although in the paragraphs following, some further details are added which make more vivid the political and social order of the kingdom, it transpires that these further facts are given as necessary to our knowledge of the situation. Thus Wamba’s discourse upon the meats reveals something of the relative position of Norman and Saxon together with the personal relations naturally existing between them; and this constitutes a most important force in the development of the romance. The allusions to Cedric and Front-de-Bœuf are incidental to the situation for these persons are prominent in the story. With the introduction of the Prior and the Templar (chapter II) our acquaintance with the situation grows; the personal allusions to Cedric, Rowena, and particularly the mention of the son banished “for lifting his eyes in affection” toward the lady, are most important. In chapter III the utterance of Cedric concerning Wilfred and the statement of Rowena’s interest in news from Palestine confirm the assertion of the Prior, while the lady’s championship of Ivanhoe (chapter V) and the description of the Palmer’s nocturnal visit to Rowena, make our understanding of the situation complete. Lady Rowena is obviously the heroine of the novel; between herself and the absent Ivanhoe exists an attachment the progress of which is hindered by the hostility of the arbitrary Thane who has disowned his son, and which is also threatened by the hate of the Knight Templar, who from the outset assumes the part of an evil element in the story just opening. The situation also involves the peculiar social antagonisms of Norman and Saxon, the pretensions of Prince John and the cause of King Richard, while the reception accorded to Isaac of York and his interview with the Palmer indicate that he also has a part to play in the romance.

The Plot. The situation once made clear, we are in position to follow with greater interest the development
THE STUDY OF THE NOVEL

the story, and this development is made manifest in the working out of what is called the plot. This last is nothing more than the thread of logical connection on which are hung the happenings that furnish the forces, the motives, and the action necessary to the growth of the story. In some novels the plot is simple; few characters are involved, the motives are plain, a single idea commands our interest.
Here in Ivanhoe a half dozen important personages demand attention at the start and as many more appear later as secondary yet prominent figures. Primarily we are interested in the fortunes of Rowena and Ivanhoe even when the identity of the latter is but suspected; at the same time our interest is aroused in other groups and in the forces which dominate them. Suppose we tabulate the more important characters of Ivanhoe; they seem to fall naturally into groups like these:

1. Ivanhoe and Rowena.
2. Cedric and Athelstane.
3. Prince John, Fitzurse and De Bracy.
   Robin Hood and Friar Tuck.
   Front-de-Bœuf and Malvoisin.
   Rebecca and Isaac.
   Gurth and Wamba.
   Bois-Guilbert and The Templars.

That is to say: (1) those who, because of their situation, directly or indirectly appeal to our sympathy; the actual hero and heroine, who are contending with the traditional difficulties that beset the path of lovers in romance, the chivalrous king, vigorously conspired against by unnatural foes, and the Jew, an object of general persecution and contempt, associated with his daughter who, through her beauty of person and character, divides affection and honor with the heroine herself; (2) the Saxons, more or less independent, more or less aggrieved; (3) the Normans, conspirators politically and personally hostile to the hero.

Now if the highest artistic success is to be attained, the threads which carry the fortunes of these individual groups must be so closely interwoven that they shall visibly form one single strand. We must be made aware that these elements, hostile and congenial, conciliatory and discordant, compose a society which by their existence, and only by their existence, is complete; that the tendencies and inclinations here presented must inevitably act and react as described, and that though badly tangled at the start, the skein will prove to be properly in order at the end. Such is the problem of the plot; it is for us to discover, if we may, by what devices that result is accomplished.

Unity of the Plot. In the first place, how is the structural unity, perhaps the most important, as it is the most difficult, essential in such a plot, to be obtained? Chiefly by showing that the interests of all the groups individually center in the interests of one group, which naturally is the important group of the narrative, that comprising the hero and the heroine of the romance. Now let the reader watch for the links in the narrative that bind these groups together, and prove for himself whether or not the bonds that unite them are natural and sufficiently strong to secure the unity required.

Scenes. The development of the plot takes place in a series of scenes. It would be well to make a list of these scenes in order, together with the chapters occupied by each. Naturally the more elaborate, the more picturesque scenes are impressed most vividly on the mind, and if one were asked to enumerate the successive scenes of Ivanhoe, the list would probably run like this:

1. The Forest near Rotherwood.
2. The Hall and Mansion of Rotherwood.
3. The Lists at Ashby.
4. The Hermit's Hut of Copmanhurst.
5. The Castle of Torquilstone.
6. The Trysting Tree.
7. Templestowe.
8. The Castle of Coningsburgh.
9. The Lists at Templestowe.

Now while the scenes mentioned are indeed prominent ones, the list is by no means complete. Several of these may be subdivided. There is really a change of scene when, though still in the forest, Gurth and Wamba are joined by the Prior and his companions; and this new scene is clearly marked by its separation in chapter II. Similarly a new scene is created by the entrance of Cedric's guests recorded in chapter IV, although the location of the scene is precisely that of the former chapter, namely, Cedric's hall. The same change occurs with Isaac's entrance in chapter X and the reader will in each case note the close of the preceding chapter for the announcement of the new event.

The chapter divisions, however, do not always correspond to the succession of scenes. In chapter VI, for example, we have, first, the scene between the Palmer and the cupbearer; second, that in the apartment of Rowena; third, the brief interview with Anwold; fourth, the morning call to Isaac; fifth, the rousing of Gurth; sixth, the journey toward Sheffield. A scene, therefore, is a section of the narrative which through the presence of the characters introduced, the conversation recorded, or the action described, is in dramatic effect, complete.

The various scenes should be classified. Some are of value as presenting portraits of the persons concerned, some contain the germ from which subsequent action is to spring, some are apparently designed for contrasts and relief, as the quiet forest scene (chapter XXXII) and others, for spectacular effect. In some scenes the action sets rapidly forward; in others it is almost stationary. Occasionally the author is compelled to go back in his narrative in order to pick up some thread of the action or to explain a situation.
which might otherwise be obscure. Note the symmetrical arrangement of scenes running through chapters XXXI which narrate the siege of Torquinstone. They arrange themselves thus:

Chapter XXI. Adventure of Cedric and Athelstane.
Chapter XXII. Adventure of Isaac and Fro Bœuf.
Chapter XXIII. Adventure of Rowena and De La.
Chapter XXIV. Adventure of Rebecca and Boisbert.
Chapter XXV. Front-de-Bœuf, De Bracy and Guilbert meet in counsel and the different movement verge. The Black Knight, Locksley, and Wamba counsel, and plans are made which bring besieger besieged together.

Chapter XXVI is Wamba’s chapter.
Chapter XXVII advances the action rapidly, intriguing Ulrica, an element of discord in the castle and th agent in its overthrow.
Chapter XXVIII is explanatory, accounting for hoe’s presence in Torquinstone, developing also Reb interest in the hero.
Chapter XXIX is the most striking scene of the and yet is not of great importance dramatically, other than in furnishing a clever device for picturesquely senting the account. It is vastly more impressive to the event by the side of those in peril than to listen to the narrative told by an historian, however eloquent he may be.

Chapter XXX belongs to Ulrica and Front-de-Bœuf.
Chapter XXXI not only describes the end of To stone, but also makes fresh disposition of the character prepares the way for the next great scene, the tra Rebecca at Templestowe.

In [Incidents. An important element in the scene is incident, or event which supplies the motive for the of the scene. In these two fields, the arrangement of and the invention of incident, the story-teller's power is severely tested. Just as the scene must contribute naturally and directly to the action of the plot, so must the incidents that enliven it occur spontaneously and at least cause no digression from the strict line of plot construction—an extravagance which the economy of novel-writing cannot permit. The incidents of any important scene may be tabulated and examined. With regard to the probability of incidents, it should be stated that more latitude is allowed the romancer than is granted to the realistic novelist. A romance frankly assumes that things shall be done in the large. An amount of hyperbole in deeds as well as in words is expected; the atmosphere is one of adventure and daring; the extraordinary and marvelous are in order; rare beauty and heroism are demanded; the superlative prevails. At the same time there is a limit set by good taste and experience, and if the story-teller over-steps that, he will fall into the ditch of the mock-heroic and the absurd. There are a number of incidents in Ivanhoe that should be tested in this regard; the reader will have no difficulty in selecting them.

In the invention and combination of incidents all degrees of artistic skill are shown. Let us examine, with reference to this point, the incidents set forth in chapters I and II. We have, first, the two thralls of Cedric fraternizing in the forest, watching the swine. The attempt to collect the scattered herd with the poor assistance of Fangs, serves to bring out several facts of importance relative to Norman rule, including Wamba's discourse on the meats. The second incident is the approach of travelers, announced by the trampling of their horses. The third is the threat of coming storm. These incidents are all preparatory to the scene in the hall at Rotherwood; let the reader trace to the end the chain of incidents thus begun. The manifest purpose of the author is to account for the assembly of characters who meet eventually in Cedric's mansion. What is served by these preliminary incidents? Would it have been as well to raise the curtain on the scene presented in chapter III, or is there a propriety and order in arrangement as it stands? Let each one of these incidents be studied in turn. What is the degree of probability each? Is the logical connection clear? What is the force of each in shaping subsequent action? Note particularly the usefulness of the storm, and consider how much of what occurs is directly attributable to its agency. Not only should these points be noted by the reader, but he should feel their comparative value in stimulating interest and heightening suspense. Sir Walter was not always so happy in his introductions as here, and it might be well to compare these opening chapters with those of his first novel, Waverley, to emphasize the point.

Climax. The incidents should be so arranged as to permit no dropping of interest; if possible, each should have more striking than the one preceding. Look through the list just made and see if this is the case here. As the story proceeds these climaxes become an important matter. There is a fine example of dramatic effect in climax in chapter V when the Palmer meets the imputations of the Templar with the words "Second to none!" Study this incident with considerable care; see how unexpected and how forceful it is; then note how interest is quickened after Rowena's championship of Ivanhoe, after which the company soon separates and the chapter ends. A similar study should be made of the climaxes in the scenes at Ashby and at Templestowe, both in their immediate connection and their relation to the final climax of the novel—the reconciliation of Cedric and the marriage of Ivanhoe.

The Characters. Finally, the characters demand our study. What touches of true nature do we find, what marks of unreal portraiture, if any? Words and actions may be inconsistent with the nature and endowment of the character as conceived; do you then find the sincere expr... of actual personality, or is the characterization obviously artificial and unreal? Always remembering the wider liberty of romance, what deeds, if any, seem incredible and likely to detract from the probability of the story? Perhaps the propensities for evil are exaggerated; can parallels of the more startling acts of cruelty be found in it? Compare these portraiture with history, and with similar attempts in other fiction. Study Shakspere's King John and also his Shylock in The Merchant of Venice. Do you think that Scott's characters show traces of Shakspere's influence? Note the author's skill in the treatment of Richard. Ivanhoe is the hero of the novel and therefore should not be presented as inferior to the best, but neither should the King appear to less advantage than his right. Do you think it more appropriate that the Jester should sound the blast which summons the outlaws (chapter L) than that Richard should? Is it not an artistic touch therefore that permits Wamba to steal the bugle from the King? What other incidents reveal the art of the novelist in this respect? Still more delicate is the relation between the two women, Rowena and Rebecca. What is your impression concerning Scott's treatment of these two characters in personality, appearance and influence?

In the more mechanical handling of his characters it is important to note the author's practice in several particulars. How does he get them before us? Are any of the important figures in Ivanhoe brought directly on the scene without previous mention? Study the careful preparation for Rowena's first appearance and note how effective is the actual introduction. In what degree are the characters self-revealing? How far is description necessary? When descriptive passages of some length do occur, is there evidence of skill in planning and placing them? In some cases disguise is evident, there is some degree of mystery evolved. In such instances how complete is the disguise as far as the reader is concerned? Is it wise to attempt utterly to conceal identity in fiction? May it not be the interest in most cases to indulge the reader in a greater suspicion of the truth? Note the stages in the identification of the Black Knight. How is the effect of heightened when the Knight reveals himself among outlaws?

Another interesting line of study on the character is to note the counter-play of influence. Chapter XI is good material for such examination. The working character on character is well brought out in the between Prince John, De Bracy and Fitzurse. Not the ruling motives displayed by each person in the for example, in Bois-Guilbert, in Isaac, Cedric, a Athelstane. Now it is easy enough to depict a "motive," but it is not so easy to blend and harmonize into the infinite variety of tendencies and motives that into human nature and give to the individual a consistent personality of his own. It is neither cature nor allegory that the novelist created, but men and women. How far in this respect do you think this novelist has succeeded? In this connection it would well to look through the "List of Characters in Ivanhoe" to consider the distinctness and individuality of picture. Suppose you number the characters in the next you happen to read and make comparisons in this with Scott. When in addition to the characters of romance we take into our count those of equal presented in his other novels, we arrive, perhaps, at an estimate of the real genius of this Wizard of the North in any other way.

Such is the line of study suggested for the read in Ivanhoe. There is not space to consider other point lechnique or other exercises that would be profitab study of the time-divisions would be interesting; s examination of the passages descriptive of A complete outline of the narrative in headings properly subordinated is almost a necessity. And all these efforts in the "study" of Ivanhoe will not only add to our knowledge of the work but will measurably heighten our enjoyment in the reading it.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

The Life of Scott, by his son-in-law, J. G. Lockhart, the authoritative biography.

The Journal of Sir Walter Scott covers the period of his later life.

The General Preface to the edition of the Waverley Novels (1829) is full of interesting autobiography concerning his youth.

Sir Walter Scott (English Men of Letters Series), by J. H. Hutton, is the best short biography.

The Life of Scott (Great Writers Series), by C. D. Yong contains an extended bibliography.

Recollections of Sir Walter Scott, by R. P. Gillis, and Domestic Manners and Private Life of Sir Walter Scott by James Hogg, are of lighter character.

Abbotsford, by Washington Irving, is a pleasant sketch of the novelist in his home.

Scott (in Encyclopædia Britannica), by William Mintz and Scott (in Chamber’s Encyclopædia), by Andrew Lang, an authoritative and concise.

Robin Hood, by Ritson, and The Old English Ballads in any standard collection, such as Percy’s Reliques, or Vol. 1 of Child’s English and Scottish Ballads, will furnish interesting material on the outlaws of Sherwood Forest.

The Waverley Dictionary, by May Rogers, contains an alphabetic arrangement of all the characters in the Waverley Novels, with a descriptive analysis of each character.
A LIST OF THE CHARACTERS APPEARING IN IVANHOE.

SEVERAL NAMES THAT ARE BARELY MENTIONED ARE OMITTED.

1. CEDRIC OF ROTHERWOOD, a Saxon Thane.
2. WILFRED OF IVANHOE, his son.
3. ROWENA, ward of Cedric.
4. ATHELSTANE OF CONINGSBURGH, a Saxon of princely rank.
5. EDITH, mother of Athelstane.
6. OSWALD, Cedric's cupbearer.
7. HUDEBERT, his major-domo.
8. WAMBA, his jester.
9. GURTH, his swineherd.
10. ANWOLD, a servant.
11. ELMITHA, Rowena's maid.
12. URFRIED (Ulrica), a Saxon woman held captive at Torquilstone.
14. PRINCE JOHN.
15. SIR BRIAN DE BOIS-GUILBERT (bwā' gěl-běr'), Knight Templar.
16. LUCAS DE BEAUMANOIR (bō-mā-nwōr'), Grand Master of the Order.
17. CONRAD DE MONT FICHET (môn fē-shā), a Preceptor of the Templars.
18. HERMAN OF GOODALRICK (good-āl-rik'-e), a Preceptor.
19. ALBERT DE MALVOISIN (māl-vwāzān'), Preceptor of Templestowe.
20. PHILIP DE MALVOISIN, a Norman noble.

*Although the pronunciation of these Norman names, as warranted by the Century Cyclopedia of Names, is appended, too much stress should not be laid upon the matter; it is not probable that Scott gave them in all cases the sound of the modern French (which certainly was not the pronunciation current in the time of Richard), and usage has largely anglicized these Latin titles familiar only through their appearance in this English classic.
21. REGINALD FRONT-DE-BŒUF (frôn de bèf), a Norman noble.
22. WALDEMAR FITZURSE (fits-érs'), John's counsellor.
23. MAURICE DE BRACY (brä-cê'), Leader of the Free Companions.

24. HUGH DE GRANTMESNIL (grân-mă-nê') Norman Knight
25. RALPH DE VIPONT (ve-pôn') Challengers i the Tourney.

26. WILLIAM DE WYVIL Marshals of the lists at Ashby
27. STEPHEN DE MARRANT de-la-Zouche (zoosh).
28. DAMIAN, a squire of the Templars at Templestowe.
29. BALDWIN d'OYLEY, a squire of Bois-Guilbert.
30. HUGH BARDON, John's scoutmaster.
31. DE BIGOT (bê-gô'), John's seneschal.

32. ANSELM
33. GILES
34. CLEMENT
35. EUSTACE Squires and servants of Front-de-Bœuf.
36. STEPHEN
37. JOCelyn
38. ST. MAUR

39. HUBERT, a forester of Philip de Malvoisin.
40. Two Mohammedan attendants on Bois-Guilbert.
41. AYMER, Prior of Jorvaulx (zhor-vôx) Abbey.
42. FATHER AMBROSE, attendant on the Prior.
43. Prior of St. Botolph's.
44. FATHER DIGGORY, a brother of St. Botolph's.
45. ISAAC OF YORK, a Jewish banker.
46. REBECCA, his daughter.
47. REUBEN AND SETH, his servants.
48. NATHAN BEN ISRAEL, a Rabbi, Isaac's friend.
49. HENRY BOHUN, Earl of Essex, High Constable of England
50. ROBIN HOOD, leader of the outlaws.
51. FRIAR TUCK, the Hermit of Copmanhurst.
52. ALLAN-A-DALE, the minstrel of the outlaws.
53. GILBERT, WIBBOLD, SCATHLOCK AND THE MILLER, outlaws
54. HIGG, son of SNELL, a peasant.
55. FATHER DENNET, a peasant.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Genealogical Table of the English Kings After the Norman Conquest</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>William I. (The Conqueror),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1066–1087.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>William II. (Rufus),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1087–1100.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>married Matilda of Scotland,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1100–1135.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Henry I.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(married Stephen of Blois).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adela (died 1137),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(married Geoffrey of Anjou).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1135–1154.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Henry II.,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1154–1189.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard I. (The Lion-Hearted),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1189–1199.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Geoffrey (died 1186),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(murdered by order of John).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reigned 1199–1216.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arthur (died 1203),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(murdered by order of John).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert (died 1134),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Duke of Normandy,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(kept prisoner in Wales, 1106–1134, by order of Henry I.)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
IVANHOE

CHAPTER I

Thus communed these; while to their lowly dome
The full-fed swine return'd with evening home,
Compell'd, reluctant, to the several sties,
With din obstreperous and ungrateful cries.

_Pope's Odyssey._

In that pleasant district of merry England which is watered by the river Don, there extended in ancient times a large forest, covering the greater part of the beautiful lakes and valleys which lie between Sheffield and the pleas-town of Doncaster.\(^1\) The remains of this extensive wood are still to be seen at the noble seats of Wentworth, Wharncliffe Park, and around Rotherham. Here lived of yore the fabulous Dragon of Wantley;\(^2\) here we fought many of the most desperate battles during the Wars of the Roses;\(^3\) and here also flourished in ancient times those bands of gallant outlaws whose deeds have been so popular in English song.

Such being our chief scene, the date of our story refers to a period towards the end of the reign of Richard I., when return from his long captivity had become an event

---

1. _Doncaster._ This termination _caster_, which appears also in Lancaster Tadcaster, is derived from the Latin _castra_, a camp, and English townenings indicating an origin during Roman rule. The endings Worcester, Leicester, and Gloucester (pronounced Wooster, Lester, dane) are from the same source, also Winchester, Dorchester, and Chest-town.

2. _Wantley._ Wantley and Wharncliffe (Wharncliffe) were originally one village. The legend which tells the exploit of More, of More Hall, in killing the dragon, is found in Percy's _Reliques_, III, 3, 13.

3. _Wars of the Roses._ Concerning this long period of civil war, see
W. S. _Short History of the English People_, chap. VI., sec. II.
rather wished than hoped for by his despairing subject, who were in the mean time subjected to every species of subordinate oppression. The nobles, whose power had become exorbitant during the reign of Stephen, and who, with the prudence of Henry the Second had scarce reduced in some degree of subjection to the crown, had now resumed their ancient license in its utmost extent; despising the feeble interference of the English Council of State, fortifying their castles, increasing the number of their dependants, reducing all around them to a state of vassalage, and striking by every means in their power to place themselves each at the head of such forces as might enable him to make a figure in the national convulsions which appeared to be impending.

The situation of the inferior gentry, or franklins, they were called, who, by the law and spirit of the English constitution, were entitled to hold themselves independent of feudal tyranny, became now unusually precarious. As was most generally the case, they placed themselves under the protection of any of the petty kings in the vicinity, accepted of feudal offices in his household, bound themselves, by mutual treaties of alliance and protection, to support him in his enterprises, they might indeed purchase temporary repose; but it must be with the sacrifice of that independence which was so dear to every English bosom, and at the certain hazard of being involved as a party in whatever rash expedition the ambition of the protector might lead him to undertake. On the other hand, such and so multiplied were the means of vexation

---

1 Vassalage. A term incident to the feudal system introduced into England by William the Conqueror. The word vassal means "servant," and was applied to those who held land subject to the will of a higher lord, rendering him such service in war and peace as he required. Thus the baron who exercised authority over vassals of their own were in turn subjects of the vassals of the king.

2 Franklin. A "freeman," holding property in his own right and, though not of the nobility, independent of the barons and subject only to the king. Read the description of the Franklin given by Chaucer in the Pardoner's Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, II. 231-360.

3 Petty Kings. The barons.
and oppression possessed by the great barons, that they never wanted the pretext, and seldom the will, to harass and pursue, even to the very edge of destruction, any of their less powerful neighbours who attempted to separate themselves from their authority, and to trust for their protection, during the dangers of the times, to their own inoffensive conduct and to the laws of the land.

A circumstance which greatly tended to enhance the tyranny of the nobility and the sufferings of the inferior classes arose from the consequences of the Conquest by Duke William of Normandy. Four generations had not sufficed to blend the hostile blood of the Normans and Anglo-Saxons, or to unite, by common language and mutual interests, two hostile races, one of which still felt the elation of triumph, while the other groaned under all the consequences of defeat. The power had been completely placed in the hands of the Norman nobility by the event of the battle of Hastings, and it had been used, as our histories assure us, with no moderate hand. The whole race of Saxon princes and nobles had been extirpated or disinherited, with few or no exceptions; nor were the numbers great who possessed land in the country of their fathers, even as proprietors of the second or of yet inferior classes. The royal policy had long been to weaken, by every means, legal or illegal, the strength of a part of the population which was justly considered as nourishing the most inveterate antipathy to their victor. All the monarchs of the Norman race had shown the most marked predilection for their Norman subjects; the laws of the chase, and many others, equally unknown to the milder and more free spirit of the Saxon constitution, had been fixed upon the necks of the subjugated inhabitants, to add weight, as it were, to the feudal chains with which they were loaded. At court, and in the castles of the great nobles, where the pomp and state of a court was emulated, Norman-French was the only language employed; in courts of law, the pleadings and judgments were delivered in the same tongue. In short, French was the language of honour, of chivalry, and even of justice, while the far more manly and expressive Anglo-Saxon was abandoned to the use of rustics and hinds, who knew no other. Still, however, the necessary intercourse between the lords of the soil, and those oppressed inferior beings by whom that soil was cultivated, occasioned the gradual formation of a dialect, compounded betwixt the French and the Anglo-Saxon, in which they could render themselves mutually intelligible to each other; and from this necessity arose by degrees the structure of our present English language, in which the speech of the victors and the vanquished have been so happily blended together; and which has since been so richly improved by importations from the classical languages, and from those spoken by the southern nations of Europe.

---

When did English come to be again recognized as the official speech of the kingdom? See chapter XLIV.

This state of things I have thought it necessary to premise for the information of the general reader, who might be apt to forget that, although no great historical events, such as war or insurrection, mark the existence of the Anglo-Saxons as a separate people subsequent to the reign of William the Second, yet the great national distinctions betwixt them and their conquerors, the recollection of what they had formerly been, and to what they were now reduced, continued, down to the reign of Edward the Third, to keep open the wounds which the Conquest had inflicted, and to maintain a line of separation betwixt the descendants of the victor Normans and the vanquished Saxons.

The sun was setting upon one of the rich grassy glades of that forest which we have mentioned in the beginning of the chapter. Hundreds of broad-headed, short-stemmed, wide-branched oaks, which had witnessed perhaps the stately march of the Roman soldiery, flung their gnarled arms over a thick carpet of the most delicious green sward; in some places they were intermingled with beeches, hollies, and copsewood of various descriptions, so closely as totally to intercept the level beams of the sinking sun; in others they receded from each other, forming those long sweeping vistas in the intricacy of which the eye delights to lose itself, while imagination considers them as the paths to yet wilder scenes of silvan solitude. Here the red rays of the sun shot a broken and discoloured light, that partially hung upon the shattered boughs and mossy trunks of the trees, and there they illuminated in brilliant patches the portions of turf to which they made their way. A considerable open space, in the midst of this glade, seemed formerly to have been dedicated to the rites of Druidical\(^1\) superstition; for, on the summit of a hillock, so regular as to seem artificial, there still remained part of a circle of rough, unhewn stones, of large dimensions. Seven stood upright; the rest had been dislodged from their places, probably by the zeal of some convert to Christianity, and lay, some prostrate near their former site, and others on the side of the hill. One large stone only had found its way to the bottom, and, in stopping the course of a small brook which glided smoothly round the foot of the eminence, gave, by its opposition, a feeble voice of murmur to the placid and elsewhere silent streamlet.

The human figures which completed this landscape were in number two, partaking, in their dress and appearance, of that wild and rustic character which belonged to the woodlands of the West Riding\(^2\) of Yorkshire at that

\(^1\) Druidical. The Druids were the priesthood of the old Celtic peoples in Britain and in Gaul. They offered human sacrifices on huge stone altars planted in sacred groves or in wild and lonely places on the open heath. Ancient ruins of their sacred structures are found here and there in England, the most famous being the great circle at Stonehenge, near Salisbury in Wiltshire.

\(^2\) West Riding. Another example of corruption in common speech, the word riding comes from the old English thrithing, a third part.
early period. The eldest of these men had a stern, savage, and wild aspect. His garment was of the simplest form imaginable, being a close jacket with sleeves, composed of the tanned skin of some animal, on which the hair had been originally left, but which had been worn off in so many places that it would have been difficult to distinguish, from the patches that remained, to what creature the fur had belonged. This primeval vestment reached from the throat to the knees, and served at once all the usual purposes of body-clothing; there was no wider opening at the collar than was necessary to admit the passage of the head, from which it may be inferred that it was put on by slipping it over the head and shoulders, in the manner of a modern shirt, or ancient hauberka. Sandals, bound with thongs made of boar’s hide, protected the feet, and a roll of thin leather was twined artificially round the legs, and, ascending above the calf, left the knees bare, like those of a Scottish Highlander. To make the jacket sit yet more close to the body, it was gathered at the middle by a broad leathern belt, secured by a brass buckle; to one side of which was attached a sort of scrip, and to the other a ram’s horn, accoutred with a mouthpiece, for the purpose of blowing. In the same belt was stuck one of those long, broad, sharp-pointed, and two-edged knives, with a buck’s-horn handle, which were fabricated in the neighbourhood, and bore even at this early period the name of a Sheffield whittle. The man had no covering upon his head, which was only defended by his own thick hair, matted and twisted together, and scorched by the influence of the sun into a rusty dark-red colour, forming a contrast with the overgrown beard upon his cheeks, which was rather of a yellow or amber hue. One part of his dress only remains, 1 Hauberka. A coat of ringed mail falling as low as the knees. The etymology of the word suggests a covering for the neck, and as it is German, probably indicates the German origin of this piece of armor.

---

2 Scripa. A bag or pouch.

3 Whittle. A knife; from Anglo-Saxon thustan, to cut.
IVANHOE

but it is too remarkable to be suppressed; it was a brass ring, resembling a dog’s collar, but without any opening, and soldered fast round his neck, so loose as to form no impediment to his breathing, yet so tight as to be incapable of being removed, excepting by the use of the file. On this singular gorget\(^1\) was engraved, in Saxon characters, an inscription of the following purport: “Gurth, the son of Beowulph, is the born thrall\(^2\) of Cedric of Rotherwood.”

Beside the swineherd, for such was Gurth’s occupation, was seated, upon one of the fallen Druidical monuments, a person about ten years younger in appearance, and whose dress, though resembling his companion’s in form, was of better materials, and of a more fantastic description. His jacket had been stained of a bright purple hue, upon which there had been some attempt to paint grotesque ornaments in different colours. To the jacket he added a short cloak, which scarcely reached half-way down his thigh; it was of crimson cloth, though a good deal soiled, lined with bright yellow; and as he could transfer it from one shoulder to the other, or at his pleasure draw it all around him, its width, contrasted with its want of longitude, formed a fantastic piece of drapery. He had thin silver bracelets upon his arms, and on his neck a collar of the same metal, bearing the inscription, “Wamba, the son of Witless, is the thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood.” This personage had the same sort of sandals with his companion, but instead of the roll of leather thong, his legs were cased in a sort of gaiters, of which one was red and the other yellow. He was provided also with a cap, having around it more than one bell, about the size of those attached to hawks, which jingled as he turned his head to one side or other; and as he seldom remained a minute in the same posture, the sound might be considered as incessant. Around the edge of this cap was a stiff bandeau\(^1\) of leather, cut at the top into open-work, resembling a coronet, while a prolongation of it, a bag arose from within it, and fell down on one shoulder, like an old-fashioned night-cap, or a jelly-bag, or the headgear of a modern hussar. It was to this part of the cap that the bells were attached; which circumstance, well as the shape of his head-dress, and his own half-crazed, half-cunning expression of countenance, sufficient to point him out as belonging to the race of domestic clowns or jesters, maintained in the houses of the wealthy to help away the tedium of those lingering hours which they were obliged to spend within doors. He bore, like his companion, a scrip attached to his belt, but had neither horn nor knife, being probably considered as belonging to a class whom it is esteemed dangerous to entrust with edged-tools. In place of these, he was equipped with a sword of lath, resembling that with which harlequin operates his wonders upon the modern stage.

\(^1\) Gorget. Armor for the throat; compare modern French gorge, throat. What English words spring from the same source?
\(^2\) Thrall. A serf or slave.

The outward appearance of these two men formed scarce a stronger contrast than their look and demeanour. That of the serf, or bondsman, was sad and sullen; his aspect was bent on the ground with an air of deep dejection, which might be almost construed into apathy, had not the fire which occasionally sparkled in his red eye manifested that there slumbered, under the appearance of sullen dependency, a sense of oppression, and a disposition to resistance. The looks of Wamba, on the other hand, indicated as usual with his class, a sort of vacant curiosity, an fidgety impatience of any posture of repose, together with the utmost self-satisfaction respecting his own situation and the appearance which he made. The dialogue which they maintained between them was carried on in Anglo-Saxon, which, as we said before, was universally spoken by the inferior classes, excepting the Norman soldiers and the immediate personal dependants of the great feudal noble.

\(^1\) Bandeau. In actual armor, always of metal.
live such a conversation in the original would convey no idea of the modern reader, for whose benefit I offer the following translation:

The curse of St. Withold upon these infernal porkers!

The swineherd, after blowing his horn obstreperously to collect together the scattered herd of swine, answered during his call with notes equally melodious, however liter, no haste to remove themselves from the dens toquét of beech-mast and acorns on which they fed, or to forsake the marshy banks of the rivulet, several of them, half plunged in mud, lay stretched or crouched, altogether regardless of the voice of their master. "The curse of St. Withold upon them and upon Garth; "if the two-legged wolf snap not up some morsel by nightfall, I am no true man. Here, Fangs!" he ejaculated at the top of his voice to a ragged, looking dog, a sort of lurcher, half mastiff, half hound, which ran limping about as if with the purpose of mischievousness, ignorance of his own duty, or malapace, only drove them hither and thither, and did the evil which he seemed to design to remedy. "I will draw the teeth of him," said Garth, "and the of mischief! confound the ranger of the forest, that he fore-claws off our dogs, and makes them unfit for trade! Waamba, up and help me an thou beest a take a turn round the back o' the hill to gain the on them; and when thou'st got the weather-gage, mayst drive them before thee as gently as so many lent lambs."

Withold. An imaginary saint. Compare Shakspere's use of the word in King Lear, III, 4, 126, whence it is borrowed by Scott.

Lurcher. From the German masten, to fatten; edible fruit, especially acorns, chestnuts, and beech-nuts, common food for hogs. See Appendix, note A. [Scott].
"Truly," said Wamba, without stirring from the seat.

"I have consulted my legs upon this matter, and they altogether of opinion that to carry my gay garment through these sloughs would be an act of unkindness to my sovereign person and royal wardrobe; whereas, Gurth, I advise thee to call off Fangs, and leave the brutes to their destiny, which, whether they meet with bands of travelling soldiers, or of outlaws, or of wandering pilgrims, can be little else than to be converted into Normans by morning, to thy no small ease and comfort."

"The swine turned Normans to my comfort!" quoth Gurth; "expound that to me, Wamba, for my brain is dull and my mind too vexed to read riddles."

"Why, how call you those grunting brutes running about on their four legs?" demanded Wamba.

"Swine, fool—swine," said the herd; "every fool knows that."

"And swine is good Saxon," said the Jester; "but I call you the sow when she is flayed, and drawn, and quartered, and hung up by the heels, like a traitor?"

"Pork," answered the swineherd.

"I am very glad every fool knows that too," said Wamba, "and pork, I think, is good Norman-French; and so will the brute lives, and is in the charge of a Saxon slave, goes by her Saxon name; but becomes a Norman, and is called pork, when she is carried to the castle hall to feed among the nobles. What dost thou think of this, friend Gurth, ha?"

"It is but too true doctrine, friend Wamba, however got into thy fool’s pate."

"Nay, I can tell you more," said Wamba in the same tone: "there is old Alderman Ox continues to hold Saxon epithet while he is under the charge of serfs a ondsmen such as thou, but becomes Beef, a fiery French allant, when he arrives before the worshipful jaws that are destined to consume him. Mynherr Calf, too, becomes monsieur de Veau in the like manner: he is Saxon when he acquires tendance, and takes a Norman name when he becomes matter of enjoyment.”

1 Pork. From the French porc. Latin porcus: -porc is from French boeuf. Veau, the French word for calf. Latin boeuf, Veau, gives us veal. For an interesting paragraph upon this dialogue, see French’s Study Words, page 98.

“By St. Dunstan,” answered Gurth, “thou speakest but and truths; little is left to us but the air we breathe, and that appears to have been reserved with much hesitation, solely for the purpose of enabling us to endure the tasks they lay upon our shoulders. The finest and the fattest is for their board; the loveliest is for their couch; the best and bravest supply their foreign masters with soldiers, and whiten distant lands with their bones, leaving few here who have either will or the power to protect the unfortunate Saxon. God’s blessing on our Master Cedric, he hath done the work of a man in standing in the gap; but Reginald Front-de-Bœuf is coming down to this country in person, and we shall soon see how little Cedric’s trouble will avail him. Here, here,” he exclaimed again, raising his voice, “So ho! so ho! well done, Fangs! thou hast them all before thee now, and bring’st them on bravely, lad.”

“Gurth,” said the Jester, “I know thou thinkest me a fool, or thou wouldst not be so rash in putting thy head into my mouth. One word to Reginald Front-de-Bœuf for Philip de Malvoisin, that thou hast spoken treason against the Norman—and thou art but a castaway swineherd; thou wouldst waver on one of these trees as a terror to all evil speakers against dignities.”

“Dog, thou wouldst not betray me,” said Gurth, “after having led me on to speak so much at disadvantage?”

“Betray thee!” answered the Jester; “no, that were the trick of a wise man; a fool cannot half so well help himself. But soft, whom have we here?” he said, listening.
to the trampling of several horses which became then audible.

"Never mind whom," answered Gurth, who had now got his herd before him, and, with the aid of Fangs, was driving them down one of the long dim vistas which we have endeavoured to describe.

"Nay, but I must see the riders," answered Wamba; "perhaps they are come from Fairyland with a message from King Oberon."¹

"A murrain² take thee!" rejoined the swineherd; "wilt thou talk of such things, while a terrible storm of thunder and lightning is raging within a few miles of us! Hark, how the thunder rumbles! and for summer rain, I never saw such broad downright flat drops fall out of the clouds; the oaks, too, notwithstanding the calm weather, sob and creak with their great boughs as if announcing a tempest. Thou canst play the rational if thou wilt; credit me for once, and let us home ere the storm begins to rage, for the night will be fearful."

Wamba seemed to feel the force of this appeal, and accompanied his companion, who began his journey after catching up a long quarter-staff³ which lay upon the grass beside him. This second Eumæus⁴ strode hastily down the forest glade, driving before him, with the assistance of Fangs, the whole herd of his inharmonious charge.

¹ Oberon. King of the Fairies. Oberon is an important character in Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream.
² Murrain. An infectious disease among cattle.
³ Quarter-staff. A stout stick six feet or more in length, a common weapon in England at this time. The wielder of the staff grasped it in the middle with one hand and gave it a rotary motion with the other, parrying the blows of his opponent and striking as occasion offered.
⁴ Eumæus. The swineherd of Ulysses, mentioned by Homer in the Odyssey.
CHAPTER II

A monk there was, a fayre for the maistrie,
An outrider that loved venerie;
A manly man, to be an abbot able,
Full many a daintie horse had he in stable.
And when he rode, men might his bridle hear Gingeling in a whistling wind as clear,
And eke as loud, as doth the chapell bell,
There as this lord was keeper of the cell.

CHAUCER.

Notwithstanding the occasional exhortation and chiding of his companion, the noise of the horsemen’s feet con-ting to approach, Wamba could not be prevented from turning occasionally on the road, upon every pretence which occurred; now catching from the hazel a cluster of ripe nuts, and now turning his head to leer after a lage maiden who crossed their path. The horsemen, therefore, soon overtook them on the road.

Their numbers amounted to ten men, of whom the two rode foremost seemed to be persons of considerable importance, and the others their attendants. It was not difficult to ascertain the condition and character of these personages. He was obviously an ecclesiastic of rank; his dress was that of a Cistercian monk, but posed of materials much finer than those which the of that order admitted. His mantle and hood were the best Flanders cloth, and fell in ample, and not graceful, folds around a handsome though somewhat tulent person. His countenance bore as little the marks of self-denial as his habit indicated contempt of worldly splendour. His features might have been calm and good, had there not lurked under the penthouse of the eye that sly epicurean twinkle which indicates the cautious voluptuary. In other respects, his profession and situation had taught him a ready command over his countenance, which he could contract at pleasure into solemnity, although its natural expression was that of good-humour, social indulgence. In defiance of conventual rules and the edicts of popes and councils, the sleeves of this dignitary were lined and turned up with rich furs, his mantles secured at the throat with a golden clasp, and the white dress proper to his order as much refined upon and ornamented as that of a Quaker beauty of the present day, while she retains the garb and costume of her sect, continues to give to its simplicity, by the choice of materials and the mode of disposing them, a certain air of coquettish attraction savouring but too much of the vanities of the world.

\[\text{monastic order of the Benedictines, founded 1098, at Cistercium, } \text{in France.}\]

This worthy churchman rode upon a well-fed, ambling mule, whose furniture was highly decorated, and whose bridle, according to the fashion of the day, was ornamented with silver bells. In his seat he had nothing of the awkwardness of the convent, but displayed the easy and habitual grace of a well-trained horseman. Indeed, it seemed that so humble a conveyance as a mule, in however good case, and however well broken to a pleasant and accommodating amble, was only used by the gallant lay brother for travelling on the road. A lay brother, one of those who followed in the train, had, for his use on other occasions, one of the most handsome Spanish jennets ever bred in Andalusia, which merchants used at that time.
ort, with great trouble and risk, for the use of persons wealth and distinction. The saddle and housings of a superb palfrey\(^1\) were covered by a long foot-cloth, which reached nearly to the ground, and on which were only embroidered mitres, crosses, and other ecclesiasticalblems. Another lay brother led a sumpter mule,\(^2\) ded probably with his superior's baggage; and twonks of his own order, of inferior station, rode together the rear, laughing and conversing with each other, without taking much notice of the other members of the alcade.

The companion of the church dignitary was a man past ty, thin, strong, tall, and muscular; an athletic figure, ich long fatigue and constant exercise seemed to have taken none of the softer part of the human form, having receed the whole to brawn, bones, and sinews, which had susned a thousand toils, and were ready to dare a thousand more. His head was covered with a scarlet cap, faced with red, of that kind which the French call mortier, from its resemblance to the shape of an inverted mortar. His countenace was therefore fully displayed, and its expression was calculated to impress a degree of awe, if not of fear, upon3 angers. High features, naturally strong and powerfullypressive, had been burnt almost into negro blackness by instant exposure to the tropical sun, and might, in their linary state, be said to slumber after the storm of passion had passed away; but the projection of the veins of the foread, the readiness with which the upper lip and its thick black moustaches quivered upon the slightest emotion, truly intimated that the tempest might be again and easly awakened. His keen, piercing, dark eyes told in every

---

\(^1\) Palfrey. Used of the ordinary riding horse employed when ease rather than strength or spirit was desired. If a knight was on a journey he usually used a palfrey, while his squire, following, led his charger, or war-horse. The word itself comes through the Old French palefroi from the Latin parasitus, a post-horse. Compare the dialogue between Ivanhoe and the Prior in chapter XL.

\(^2\) Sumpter Mule. A baggage mule.
glance a history of difficulties subdued and dangers dared, and seemed to challenge opposition to his wishes, for the pleasure of sweeping it from his road by a determined exertion of courage and of will; a deep scar on his brow gave additional sternness to his countenance and a sinister expression to one of his eyes, which had been slightly injured on the same occasion, and of which the vision, though perfect, was in a slight and partial degree distorted.

The upper dress of this personage resembled that of his companion in shape, being a long monastic mantle; but the colour, being scarlet, showed that he did not belong to any of the four regular orders of monks. On the right shoulder of the mantle there was cut, in white cloth, a cross of a peculiar form. This upper robe concealed what at first view seemed rather inconsistent with its form, a shirt, namely, of linked mail, with sleeves and gloves of the same, curiously plaited and interwoven, as flexible to the body as those which are now wrought in the stocking-loom out of less obdurate materials. The fore-part of his thighs, where the folds of his mantle permitted them to be seen, were also covered with linked mail; the knees and feet were defended by splints, or thin plates of steel, ingeniously jointed upon each other; and mail hose, reaching from the ankle to the knee, effectually protected the legs, and completed the rider’s defensive armour. In his girdle he wore a long and double-edged dagger, which was the only offensive weapon about his person.

He rode, not a mule, like his companion, but a strong hackney for the road, to save his gallant war-horse, which a squire led behind, fully accoutred for battle, with a chamfron or plaited head-piece upon his head, having a short spike projecting from the front. On one side of the saddle hung a short battle-axe, richly inlaid with Damas-

---

1 The Four Orders. The four orders or societies of monks were the Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Carmelites.

2 Cross. The Maltese cross, so called.
scone carving; on the other the rider’s plumed head-piece and hood of mail, with a long two-handled sword, used by the chivalry of the period. A second squire held aloft his master’s lance, from the extremity of which fluttered a small banderole, or streamer, bearing a cross of the same form with that embroidered upon his cloak. He also carried his small triangular shield, broad enough at the top to protect the breast, and from thence diminishing to a point. It was covered with a scarlet cloth, which prevented the device from being seen.

These two squires were followed by two attendants, whose dark visages, white turbans, and the Oriental form of their garments, showed them to be natives of some distant Eastern country. The whole appearance of this warrior and his retinue was wild and outlandish; the dress of his squires was gorgeous, and his Eastern attendants wore silver collars round their throats, and bracelets of the same metal upon their swarthy legs and arms, of which the latter were naked from the elbow, and the former from mid-leg to ankle. Silk and embroidery distinguished their dresses, and marked the wealth and importance of their master; forming, at the same time, a striking contrast with the martial simplicity of his own attire. They were armed with crooked sabres, having the hilt and baldric inlaid with gold, and matched with Turkish daggers of yet more costly workmanship. Each of them bore at his saddle-bow a bundle of darts or javelins, about four feet in length, having sharp steel heads, a weapon much in use among the Saracens, and of which the memory is yet pre-

1 Device. The motto or symbol, identifying the knight. See chap. VIII, for the device of Ivanhoe.

2 Squires. Attendants upon the knight. The word comes through the Old French escuyer, from the Latin scutiger shield-bearer. The relations between knight and squire while formal were multifarious and intimate. Although only a servant, the squire was in most cases himself in training for knighthood, and his period of service was a part of his novitiate. For a pleasant portraiture of the squire, see Chaucer’s Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, ii. 79-100.

3 Dark visages. See Appendix, note B. [Scott].

4 Baldric. A belt crossing shoulder and breast diagonally.
served in the martial exercise called el jerrid,\(^1\) still practised in the Eastern countries.

The steeds of these attendants were in appearance to all appearance as their riders. They were of Saracen origin, consequently of Arabian descent; and their fine sleek limbs, small fetlocks, thin manes, and easy springy motion, formed a marked contrast with the large-jointed horses, of which the race was cultivated in Flanders and Normandy for mounting the men-at-arms of the period. All the panoply of plate and mail, and which, placed by the side of those Eastern coursers, might have passed for a personification of substance and of shadow.

The singular appearance of this cavalcade not only attracted the curiosity of Wamba, but excited even that of his less volatile companion. The monk he instantly knew to be the Prior\(^2\) of Jorvaulx Abbey, well known for miles around as a lover of the chase, of the banquet, if fame did him not wrong, of other worldly pleasures more inconsistent with his monastic vows.

Yet so loose were the ideas of the times respecting the conduct of the clergy, whether secular or regular,\(^3\) that the Prior Aymer maintained a fair character in the neighborhood of his abbey. His free and jovial temper, and readiness with which he granted absolution from all ordinary delinquencies, rendered him a favourite among the nobility and principal gentry, to several of whom he was allied by birth, being of a distinguished Norman family. The ladies, in particular, were not disposed to scan nicely the morals of a man who was a professed admirer of their sex, and who possessed many means of dispel... the ennui which was too apt to intrude upon the halls and towers of an ancient feudal castle. The Prior mingled in the sports of the field with more than due eagerness, and as allowed to possess the best-trained hawks and the fleetest greyhounds in the North Riding—circumstances which strongly recommended him to the youthful gentry. With his old he had another part to play, which, when needful, he could sustain with great decorum. His knowledge of books, however superficial, was sufficient to impress upon their ignorance respect for his supposed learning; and the gravity of his deportment and language, with the high tone which he exerted in setting forth the authority of the church and of the priesthood, impressed them no less with an opinion of his sanctity. Even the common people, the severest critics of the conduct of their betters, had compassionation with the follies of Prior Aymer. He was generous; and charity, as it is well known, covereth a multitude of sins, in another sense than that in which it is said to do so in Scripture. The revenues of the monastery, of which a large part was at his disposal, while they gave him the means of supplying his own very considerable expenses, afforded also those largesses 1 which he bestowed among the peasantry, and with which he frequently relieved the distresses of the oppressed. If Prior Aymer rode hard in the chase, or remained long at the banquet, if Prior Aymer was seen at the early peep of dawn to enter the postern of the abbey, as he glided home from some rendezvous which had occupied the hours of darkness, men only shrugged up their shoulders, and reconciled themselves to his irregularities by recollecting that the time were practised by many of his brethren who had no redeeming qualities whatsoever to atone for them. Prior Aymer, therefore, and his character, were well known to the Saxon serfs, who made their rude obeisance, and received his “Benedicite, mes filz,” 2 in return.

1 LARGESSES. Gifts.
2 BENEDICITE, MES FILZ. “Bless you, my sons.”
But the singular appearance of his companion and attendants arrested their attention and excited wonder, and they could scarcely attend to the Prior Jorvaulx’ question, when he demanded if they knew of place of harbourage in the vicinity; so much were they surprised at the half-monastic, half-military appearance of the swarthy stranger, and at the uncouth dress and of his Eastern attendants. It is probable, too, that language in which the benediction was conferred, and information asked, sounded ungracious, though not probably unintelligible, in the ears of the Saxon peasants.

“I asked you, my children,” said the Prior, raising voice, and using the lingua Franca, or mixed language which the Norman and Saxon races conversed with each other, “if there be in this neighbourhood any good who, for the love of God and devotion to Mother Church, will give two of her humblest servants, with their train night’s hospitality and refreshment?”

This he spoke with a tone of conscious import which formed a strong contrast to the modest terms with he thought it proper to employ.

“Two of the humblest servants of Mother Church,” repeated Wamba to himself, but, fool as he was, take care not to make his observation audible; “I should like to see her seneschals,¹ her chief butlers, and her other principal domestics!”

After this internal commentary on the Prior’s speech, he raised his eyes and replied to the question which had been put.

“If the reverend fathers,” he said, “loved good c and soft lodging, few miles of riding would carry them to the Priory of Brinxworth, where their quality could but secure them the most honourable reception; or if preferred spending a penitential evening, they might ¹Seneschals. High stewards; an office of considerable importance and dignity. The word means etymologically, “an old servant.”

down yonder wild glade, which would bring them to the hermitage of Copmanhurst, where a pious anchoret\(^1\) would make them sharers for the night of the shelter of his roof and the benefit of his prayers.”

The Prior shook his head at both proposals.

“Mine honest friend,” said he, “if the jangling of thy bells had not dizzied thine understanding, thou mightest know Clericus clericum non decimat;\(^2\) that is to say, we churchmen do not exhaust each other’s hospitality, but rather require that of the laity, giving them thus an opportunity to serve God in honouring and relieving His appointed servants.”

“It is true,” replied Wamba, “that I, being but an ass, am, nevertheless, honoured to bear the bells as well as your reverence’s mule; notwithstanding, I did conceive that the-charity of Mother Church and her servants might be ser-rend with other charity, to begin at home.”

“A truce to thine insolence, fellow,” said the high reach rider, breaking in on his prattle with a high ant a place voice, “and tell us, if thou canst, the road to—show the call’d you your franklin, Prior Aymer?”

“Cedric,” answered the Prior—“Cedric the S.
Tell me, good fellow, are we near his dwelling, and you show us the road?”

“The road will be uneasy to find,” answered Gurth who broke silence for the first time, “and the family of Cedric retire early to rest.”

“Tush, tell not me, fellow!” said the military rider;
“tis easy for them to arise and supply the wants of travelers such as we are, who will not stoop to beg the hospitality which we have a right to command.”

“I know not,” said Gurth, sullenly, “if I should show the way to my master’s house to those who demand as a right the shelter which most are fain to ask as a favours.”

\(^1\)ANCHORET. Anchorite, a hermit; from a Greek word signifying one who Wills from the world.

\(^2\)CLERICUS, etc. “A priest does not take tithes of a priest.”
“Do you dispute with me, slave!” said the soldier; and, doing spurs to his horse, he caused him to make a demi-volte⁴ across the path, raising at the same time the riding rod which he held in his hand, with a purpose of chastising what he considered as the insolence of the peasant.

Gurth darted at him a savage and revengeful scowl, and with a fierce yet hesitating motion laid his hand on the haft of his knife; but the interference of Prior Aymer, who pushed his mule betwixt his companion and the swine-herd, prevented the meditated violence.

“Nay, by St. Mary, brother Brian, you must not think you are now in Palestine, predominating over heathen Turks and infidel Saracens; we islanders love not blows, save those of Holy Church, who chasteneth whom she loveth. Tell me, good fellow,” said he to Wamba, and whispered his speech by a small piece of silver coin, “the will give Cedric the Saxon’s; you cannot be ignorant of it night’s is your duty to direct the wanderer even when his

This is less sanctified than ours.”

which for truth, venerable father,” answered the Jester, “th
he thon he head of your right reverend companion has fright

“Tut of mine the way home: I am not sure I shall repea to-night myself.”
care “Tush,” said the Abbot, “thou canst tell us if thou w seen his reverend brother has been all his life engaged in fight ing among the Saracens for the recovery of the Sepulchre; he is of the order of Knights Templars,⁵ who may have heard of; he is half a monk, half a soldier.

“If he is but half a monk,” said the Jester, “he sh

¹ Demivolte. A half-turn.

² Knights Templars. There were three principal military orders f at different times with a religious purpose. The Knights Hospitalers built a hospital at Jerusalem for the benefit of pilgrims; they were also as the Knights of St. John. The Teutonic Order, established by Germans, founded the of St. John. and later the Knights of Rhodes and the Temple, some time in the twelfth century, established headquarter

Temple, some time in the twelfth century, established headquarter

Mosque of St. Omar, on the reputed site of the Temple of Solomon now influential throughout Europe, and finally, because of their th power and arrogance, were suppressed by a Church council in 1312 article on Templars in the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

not be wholly unreasonable with those whom he meets upon the road, even if they should be in no hurry to answer questions that no way concern them."

"I forgive thy wit," replied the Abbot, "on condition thou wilt show me the way to Cedric's mansion."

"Well, then," answered Wamba, "your reverences must hold on this path till you come to a sunken cross, of which scarce a cubit's length remains above ground; then take the path to the left, for there are four which meet at Sunken Cross, and I trust your reverences will obtain shelter before the storm comes on."

The Abbot thanked his sage adviser; and the cavalcade, setting spurs to their horses, rode on as men do who wish to reach their inn before the bursting of a night-storm.

As their horses' hoofs died away, Gurth said to his companion, "If they follow thy wise direction, the reverend seers will hardly reach Rotherwood this night."

"Well, said the Jester, grinning, "but they may reach and it will if they have good luck, and that is as fit a place character. I am not so bad a woodsman as to show the way to the deer lies, if I have no mind he should chase Sarch, Thou art right," said Gurth; "it were ill that Aymer then the Lady Rowena; and it were worse, it may be, for Cedric to quarrel, as is most likely he would, with this military monk. But, like good servants, let us hear and see, and say nothing."

We return to the riders, who had soon left the bondsmen far behind them, and who maintained the following conversation in the Norman-French language, usually employed by the superior classes, with the exception of the few who were still inclined to boast their Saxon descent:

"What mean these fellows by their capricious insolence?" said the Templar to the Cistercian, "and why did you prevent me from chastising it?"
“Marry,1 brother Brian,” replied the Prior, “touching one of them, it were hard for me to render a reason for a fool speaking according to his folly; and the old church2 is of that savage, fierce, intractable race some of whom, as I have often told you, are still to be found among the descendants of the conquered Saxons, and with supreme pleasure it is to testify, by all means in their power, their aversion to their conquerors.”

“I would soon have beat him into courtesy,” observed Brian; “I am accustomed to deal with such spirits. Of Turkish captives are as fierce and intractable as Od; himself could have been; yet two months in my house under the management of my master of the slaves, have made them humble, submissive, serviceable, and observant of your will. Marry, sir, you must beware of the point and the dagger; for they use either with free will when they give them the slightest opportunity.”

“Ay, but,” answered Prior Aymer, “every land has its own manners and fashions; and, besides that beating the fellow could procure us no information respecting the man to Cedric’s house, it would have been sure to have established a quarrel betwixt you and him had we found our way thither. Remember what I told you: this weak franklin is proud, fierce, jealous, and irritable, a withstander of the nobility, and even of his neighborhood; Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and Philip Malvoisin, who are the babes to strive with. He stands up so sternly for the privileges of his race, and is so proud of his uninterrupted descent from Hereward,4 a renowned champion of

---

1 Marry. Originally an oath; a corruption of Mary, the name of the Mother of Christ; used here and elsewhere with force of “In truth “Indeed.”

2 Churl. A feudal term of Saxon origin designating a common work on the farm. But a freeman, not a serf, or thrall. The evident characteristics of the churl are suggested by the epithet, “churlish.”

3 Odin. In Scandinavian mythology, the chief of the gods. Read Carlyle’s Interpretation of Odin in Heroes and Hero-Worship.

4 Hereward. A Saxon hero, the last to make resistance against the conquest of England by William. Read Charles Kingsley’s historical work Hereward the Wake.
that he is universally called Cedric the Saxon; a boast of his belonging to a people from whom others endeavoured to hide their descent, lest they encounter a share of the vaevictis, or severities upon the vanquished."

"Sir Aymer," said the Templar, "you are a man of study, learned in the study of beauty, and as expert as yourself in matters concerning the arrêts of love; I shall expect much beauty in this celebrated Rowena, to balance the self-denial and forbearance which I exert if I am to court the favour of such a seditious lady as you have described her father Cedric."

"Cedric is not her father," replied the Prior, "and is but a relation: she is descended from higher blood than he pretends to, and is but distantly connected with him by birth. Her guardian, however, he is, self-styled as I believe; but his ward is as dear to him as were his own child. Of her beauty you shall soon be in the balance and found wanting, you know our ancient code."

"I am the judge," answered the Templar, "against ten gold collars, they are mine as securely as if they

ARCHY. The name given to the union of the seven principal Anglo-Saxon kingdoms; as a matter of fact, this union was dissolved in the Domesday Book of the time.

Victims. "Woe to the vanquished": a war-cry of the Romans, often heard at the gladiatorial shows.

Rouery. A wandering poet or minstrel, prominent in the social life of the Middle Ages, and associated with the literature of chivalry.

Nasr. The name of a holy man. It is (as the word nouqua) a *Arabic word; the name given to the nymphs of Paradise.

Mo. Mohammed.
were already in the convent vaults, under the key of Dennis, the cellarer."

"And I am myself to be judge," said the Templar, "I am only to be convicted on my own admission that I have seen no maiden so beautiful since Pentecost was a twelve month. Ran it not so? Prior, your collar is in danger. I will wear it over my gorget in the lists of Ashby-de-Zouche."

"Win it fairly," said the Prior, "and wear it as ye will. I will trust your giving true response, on your word as a knight and as a churchman. Yet, brother, take my advice, and file your tongue to a little more courtesy in your habits of predominating over infidel captives. Eastern bondsmen have accustomed you. Cedric the Saxon, if offended—and he is no way slack in taking offence—is a man who, without respect to your knighthood, my high office, or the sanctity of either, would drive his house of us, and send us to lodge with the larks, though the hour were midnight. And be careful how you look on Rowena, whom he cherishes with the most jealous care. Can he take the least alarm in that quarter we are but men. It is said he banished his only son from his family for lifting his eyes in the way of affection towards the beauty, who may be worshipped, it seems, at a distance, but is not to be approached with other thoughts than such we bring to the shrine of the Blessed Virgin."

"Well, you have said enough," answered the Templar, "I will for a night put on the needful restraint, and depose me as meekly as a maiden; but as for the fear of his exalting us by violence, myself and squires, with Hamet and Abdalla, will warrant you against that disgrace. Doubt not that we shall be strong enough to make good our quarters."

"We must not let it come so far," answered the Prior.

1 Pentecost. That festival of the Church now called Whitsuntide.
2 Lists. "Borders"; here, the ground enclosed for combat.
here is the clown's sunken cross, and the night is so that we can hardly see which of the roads we are to He bid us turn, I think, to the left."
the right," said Brian, "to the best of my remem-
the left—certainly the left; I remember his point-his wooden sword."
but he held his sword in his left hand, and so across his body with it," said the Templar.
maintained his opinion with sufficient obstinacy,
all in all such cases; the attendants were appealed they had not been near enough to hear Wamba's strength Brian remarked, what had at first escaped the twilight: "Here is some one either asleep or ad at the foot of this cross. Hugo, stir him with end of thy lance."
was no sooner done than the figure arose, exclaimwood French, "Whosoever thou art, it is discourteous to disturb my thoughts."
did but wish to ask you," said the Prior, "the road
wood, the abode of Cedric the Saxon."
myself am bound thither," replied the stranger;
I had a horse I would be your guide, for the way that intricate, though perfectly well known to me."
ou shalt have both thanks and reward, my friend," Prior, "if thou wilt bring us to Cedric's in safety."
he caused one of his attendants to mount his own and give that upon which he had hitherto ridden stranger who was to serve for a guide.
conductor pursued an opposite road from that Wamba had recommended for the purpose of mis-them. The path soon led deeper into the woodcrossed more than one brook, the approach to as rendered perilous by the marshes through which
; but the stranger seemed to know, as it by instinct, the soundest ground and the safest points of passage; and, by dint of caution and attention, brought the party safely into a wider avenue than any they had seen; and, pointing to a large, low, irregular building at the upper extremity, he said to the Prior, "Yonder Rotherwood, the dwelling of Cedric the Saxon."

This was a joyful intimation to Aymer, whose nerves were none of the strongest, and who had suffered such agitation and alarm in the course of passing through the dangerous bogs, that he had not yet had the curiosity to ask his guide a single question. Finding himself now at his ease and near shelter, his curiosity began to awake, and he demanded of the guide who and what he was.

"A palmer,¹ just returned from the Holy Land," was the answer.

"You had better have tarried there to fight for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre," said the Templar.

"True, Reverend Sir Knight," answered the Palmer, whom the appearance of the Templar seemed perfectly familiar; "but when those who are under oath to recover the holy city are found travelling at such a distance from the scene of their duties, can you wonder that a peaceful peasant like me should decline the task which they have abandoned?"

The Templar would have made an angry reply, but was interrupted by the Prior, who again expressed his astonishment that their guide, after such long absence, should be so perfectly acquainted with the passes of the forest.

"I was born a native of these parts," answered their guide, and as he made the reply they stood before the mansion of Cedric—a low, irregular building, containing several courtyards or inclosures, extending over a considerable space of ground, and which, though its size argued the inhabitant to be a person of wealth, differed entirely from ¹A palmer, a pilgrim who had visited the holy places at Jerusalem, who bore a palm branch as apparent token of his visit.

tall, turreted, and castellated buildings in which the forman nobility resided, and which had become the unicersal style of architecture throughout England.
Rotherwood was not, however, without defences; no habitation, in that disturbed period, could have been so without the risk of being plundered and burnt before the next morning. A deep fosse,¹ or ditch, was drawn round the whole building, and filled with water from a neighboring stream. A double stockade, or palisade, composed of pointed beams, which the adjacent forest supplied, de-defended the outer and inner bank of the trench. There was an entrance from the west through the outer stockade, which communicated by a drawbridge with a similar opening in the interior defences. Some precautions had been taken to place those entrances under the protection of projecting angles, by which they might be flanked in case of assaid by archers or slingers.

Before this entrance the Templar wound his horn loudly; for the rain, which had long threatened, began now to descend with great violence.

¹ Fosse. From the Latin fossa, a ditch; one of the half-dozen words reused in English from the period of the Roman occupation, which ended in 411.
CHAPTER III

Then (sad relief!) from the bleak coast that hears
The German Ocean roar, deep-blooming, strong,
And yellow-hair'd, the blue-eyed Saxon came.

THOMSON's Liberty.

In a hall, the height of which was greatly dispropor-tioned to its extreme length and width, a long oaken tabiformed of planks rough-hewn from the forest, and which had scarcely received any polish, stood ready prepared for the evening meal of Cedric the Saxon. The roof, composed of beams and rafters, had nothing to divide the apartment from the sky excepting the planking of the thatch; there was a huge fireplace at either end of the hall, but as the chimneys were constructed in a very clumsy manner, at least as much of the smoke found its way into the apartment as escaped by the proper vent. The constant vapour which this occasioned had polished the rafters and beams of the low-browed hall, by encrusting them with a black varnish of soot. On the sides of the apartment hung implements of war and of the chase, and there were at each corner folding doors, which gave access to other parts of the extensive building.

The other appointments of the mansion partook of the rude simplicity of the Saxon period, which Cedric piqued himself upon maintaining. The floor was composed of earth mixed with lime, trodden into a hard substance, such as is often employed in flooring our modern barns. For about one quarter of the length of the apartment the floor was raised by a step, and this space, which was called the dais, was occupied only by the principal members of the family and visitors of distinction. For this purpose, a table richly covered with scarlet cloth was placed transversely across the platform, from the middle of which ran the longer and lower board, at which the domestics and interior persons fed, down towards the bottom of the hall.
The whole resembled the form of the letter \( T \), or some of those ancient dinner-tables which, arranged on the same Principles, may be still seen in the antique Colleges of Oxford or Cambridge. Massive chairs and settles of carved oak were placed upon the dais, and over these seats and the more elevated table was fastened a canopy of cloth, which served in some degree to protect the dignitaries who occupied that distinguished station from the weather, and especially from the rain, which in some places found its way through the ill-constructed roof.

The walls of this upper end of the hall, as far as the dais extended, were covered with hangings or curtains, and upon the floor there was a carpet, both of which were dorned with some attempts at tapestry or embroidery, excuted with brilliant, or rather gaudy, colouring. Over the ower range of table, the roof, as we have noticed, had no covering; the rough plastered walls were left bare, and the rude earthen floor was uncarpeted; the board was uncovered by a cloth, and rude massive benches supplied the place of chairs.

In the centre of the upper table were placed two chairs
more elevated than the rest, for the master and mistress of the family, who presided over the scene of hospitality, and from doing so derived their Saxon title of honour, which signifies “the Dividers of Bread.”¹

To each of these chairs was added a footstool, curiously carved and inlaid with ivory, which mark of dis-

¹ Dividers of Bread. The words lord and lady are derived through the name Mæförd and hlæfdige, from the Anglo-Saxon hlæf, a loaf, in composition respectively with mæf, warder, protector, provider, and ðæges (?) kneader or distributer; the form and meaning of the latter termination is not altogether certain.
tinction was peculiar to them. One of these seats present occupied by Cedric the Saxon, who, though rank a thane, or, as the Normans called him, a freeholder, though not of the old nobility.

It appeared, indeed, from the countenance of the prior, that he was of a frank, but hasty and fiery temper. He was not above the middle stature, but shoulled, long-armed, and powerfully made, like one accustomed to endure the fatigue of war or of the chase. His face was broad, with large blue eyes, open and frank features, fine teeth, and a well-formed head, altogether expressive of that sort of good humour which often, with a sudden and hasty temper. Pride and jealousy were in his eye, for his life had been spent in asserting which were constantly liable to invasion; and the fiery, and resolute disposition of the man had been constantly upon the alert by the circumstances of situation. His long yellow hair was equally divided top of his head and upon his brow, and combed down each side to the length of his shoulders: it had but a tendency to grey, although Cedric was approaching his sixtieth year.

His dress was a tunic of forest green, furred throat and cuffs with what was called minever—a fur inferior in quality to ermine, and formed, believed, of the skin of the grey squirrel. This doublet unbuttoned over a close dress of scarlet which sat to his body; he had breeches of the same, but they reach below the lower part of the thigh, leaving the exposed. His feet had sandals of the same fashion the peasants, but of finer materials, and secured the front with golden clasps. He had bracelets of gold to his arms, and a broad collar of the same precious

\[ Thane. A \text{ freeholder, though not of the old nobility. }\]
About his waist he wore a richly studded belt, in which was stuck a short, straight, two-edged sword, on a sharp point, so disposed as to hang almost perpendicularly by his side. Behind his seat was hung a scarlet cloak lined with fur, and a cap of the same materials, also embroidered, which completed the dress of the opulent landholder when he chose to go forth. A short boar-spear, with a broad and bright steel head, also reclined against the back of his chair, which served him, when he rode abroad, for the purposes of a staff or of a weapon, chance might require.

Several domestics, whose dress held various proportions with the richness of their master’s and the coarse and simple attire of Gurth, the swineherd, watched the looks of the Saxon dignitary. Two of three servants of a superior order stood behind their master upon the dais; the rest occupied the lower part of the hall. Other attendants there were of a different description: two or three large and shaggy greyhounds, such were then employed in hunting the stag and wolf; any slow-hounds, of a large bony breed, with thick legs, large heads, and long ears; and one or two of the smaller dogs, now called terriers, which waited with impatience the arrival of the supper; but, with the sagacious knowledge of physiognomy peculiar to their race, forced to intrude upon the moody silence of their master,prehensive probably of a small white truncheon, which was by Cedric’s trencher, for the purpose of repelling the advances of his four-legged dependants. One grisly old hound alone, with the liberty of an indulged favourite, planted himself close by the chair of state, and occasionally ventured to solicit notice by putting his large head upon his master’s knee, or pushing his nose into his hand. Even he was repelled by the stern command,
"Down, Balder!—down! I am not in the humour for foolery."

In fact, Cedric, as we have observed, was in no very placid state of mind. The Lady Rowena, who had been absent to attend an evening mass at a distant church, had but just returned, and was changing her garments, which had been wetted by the storm. There were as yet no tidings of Gurth and his charge, which should long since have been driven home from the forest; and such was the insecurity of the period as to render it probable that the delay might be explained by some depredation of the outlaws, with whom the adjacent forest abounded, or by the violence of some neighbouring baron, whose consciousness of strength made him equally negligent of the laws of property. The matter was of consequence, for great part of the domestic wealth of the Saxon proprietors consisted in numerous herds of swine, especially in forest land, where those animals easily found their food.

Besides these subjects of anxiety, the Saxon thane was impatient for the presence of his favourite clown, Wamba, whose jests, such as they were, served for a sort of seasoning to his evening meal, and to the deep draughts of ale and wine with which he was in the habit of accompanying it. Add to all this, Cedric had fasted since noon, and his usual supper hour was long past, a cause of irritation common to country squires, both in ancient and modern times. His displeasure was expressed in broken sentences partly muttered to himself, partly addressed to the domestics who stood around; and particularly to his cupbearer, who offered him from time to time, as a sedative, a silver goblet filled with wine—"Why tarries the Lady Rowena?"

"She is but changing her head-gear," replied a female attendant, with as much confidence as the favourite lady's maid usually answers the master of a modern family; "you would not wish her to sit down to the banquet in her hood.

1 _Balder_. The name of the Norse sun-god.
and no lady within the shire can be quicker herself than my mistress."

Tenuous argument produced a sort of acquiescence on the part of the Saxon, with the addition, devotion may choose fair weather for the next John's Kirk. But what, in the name of ten devils, keeps Gurth so long up supposing we shall have an evil account of the s went to be a faithful and cautious drudge, destined him for something better; perchance I have made him one of my warders."

the cup-bearer, modestly suggested, "That it in an hour since the tolling of the curfew"—an analogy, since it turned upon a topic so harsh to a fiend," exclaimed Cedric, "take the curfew—tyrannical bastard by whom it was devised, less slave who names it with a Saxon tongue in! The curfew!" he added, pausing—"ay, the h compels true men to extinguish their lights, and robbers may work their deeds in dark—de the curfew! Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and alvoisin know the use of the curfew as well he Bastard himself, or e'er a Norman adven-re used of a cloak, though usually meaning a skirt or tunic. The original has Oñichts, by which the Saxons seem to have s of military attendants, sometimes free, sometimes bondsman, ranking above an ordinary domestic, whether in the royal those of the aldermen and thanes. But the term Oñicht, having been received into the English language as equivalent word chevalier, I have avoided using it in its more ancient confusion. L. T. [Scott].

might have added that in German the word still survives as although indicating a position even more humble than the bell which announced the hour fixed by Norman law to lights, and hence for retiring. This law was most unpopular gentry, against whose independence it was aimed. "The ver-fire," from the French couvre-feu.

turer that fought at Hastings. I shall hear, I guess, that my property has been swept off to save from starving the hungry banditti whom they cannot support but by theft and robbery. My faithful slave is murdered, and my goods are taken for a prey; and Wamba—where is Wamba? Said not some one he had gone forth with Gurth?"

Oswald replied in the affirmative.

"Ay! why, this is better and better! he is carried off too, the Saxon fool, to serve the Norman lord. Fools are we all indeed that serve them, and fitter subjects for their scorn and laughter than if we were born with but half our wits. But I will be avenged," he added, starting from his chair in impatience at the supposed injury, and catching hold of his boar spear; "I will go with my complaint to the great council. I have friends, I have followers; man to man will I appeal the Norman to the lists. Let him come in his plate and his mail, and all that can render cowardice bold: I have sent such a javelin as this through a stronger fence than three of their war shields! Haply they think me old; but they shall find, alone and childless as I am, the blood of Hereward is in the veins of Cedric. Ah, Wilfred, Wilfred!" he exclaimed in a lower tone, "couldst thou have ruled thine unreasonable passion, thy father had not been left in his age like the solitary oak that throws out its shattered and unprotected branches against the full sweep of the tempest!" The reflection seemed to conjure into sadness his irritated feelings. Replacing his javelin, he resumed his seat, bent his looks downward, and ap-ppeared to be absorbed in melancholy reflection.

From his musing Cedric was suddenly awakened by the blast of a horn, which was replied to by the clamorous yells and barking of all the dogs in the hall, and some twenty or thirty which were quartered in other parts of the building. It cost some exercise of the white truncheon, I seconded by the exertions of the domestics, to silence canine clamour.

"To the gate, knaves!" said the Saxon, hastily, as soon the tumult was so much appeased that the dependants could hear his voice. "See what tidings that horn tells of: to announce, I ween, some hership\textsuperscript{1} and robbery which has been done upon my lands."

Returning in less than three minutes, a warder announced, "That the Prior Aymer of Jorvaulx, and the good knight Brian de Bois-Guilbert, commander of the valiant and venerable order of Knight Templars, with a small train, requested hospitality and lodging for the night, being on their way to a tournament\textsuperscript{2} which was to be held far from Ashby-de-la-Zouche on the second day from present."

"Aymer—the Prior Aymer! Brian de Bois-Guilbert!" uttered Cedric—"Normans both; but Norman or Saxon, hospitality of Rotherwood must not be impeached: they are welcome, since they have chosen to halt; more come would they have been to have ridden further on their way. But it were unworthy to murmur for a night's resting and a night's food; in the quality of guests, at least, even Normans must suppress their insolence. Go, Hundeber, he added, to a sort of major-domo\textsuperscript{3} who stood by him with a white wand; "take six of the attendants and introduce the strangers to the guests' lodging. Look after their horses and mules, and see their train lack nothing. Let them have change of vestments if they require, and fire, and water to wash, and wine and ale; and bid the cooks add what they hastily can to our evening meal; I let it be put on the board when those strangers are ready to share it. Say to them, Hundeber, that Cedric and myself bid them welcome, but he is under a vow.

\textsuperscript{1}Hership. Pillage. [Scott.]
\textsuperscript{2}Tournament. Sometimes tourney, from the French tourner, to turn; a combat between knights. The words tilt and joust are synonymous.
\textsuperscript{3}Major-domo. Steward; more literally "master in the house."
never to step more than three steps from the dais of his own hall to meet any who shares not the blood of Saxon royalty. Begone! see them carefully tended; let them not say in their pride, the Saxon churl has shown at once his poverty and his avarice."

The major-domo departed with several attendants to execute his master's commands. "The Prior Aymel!" repeated Cedric, looking to Oswald, "the brother, if I mistake not, of Giles de Mauleverer, now lord of Middleham?"

Oswald made a respectful sign of assent. "His brother sits in the seat, and usurps the patrimony, of a better race—the race of Ulfgar of Middleham; but what Norman lord doth not the same? This Prior is, they say, a free and jovial priest, who loves the wine-cup and the bugle-horn better than bell and book. Good; let him come, he shall be welcome. How named ye the Templar?"

"Brian de Bois-Guilbert."

"Bois-Guilbert!" said Cedric, still in the musing, half-arguing tone which the habit of living among dependants had accustomed him to employ, and which resembled a man who talks to himself rather than to those around him—"Bois-Guilbert! That name has been spread wide both for good and evil. They say he is valiant as the bravest of his order; but stained with their usual vices—pride, arrogance, cruelty, and voluptuousness—a hard-hearted man, who knows neither fear of earth nor awe of heaven. So say the few warriors who have returned from Palestine. Well, it is but for one night; he shall be welcome too. Oswald, broach the oldest wine-cask; place the best meat, the mightiest ale, the richest morat, the most sparkling cider, the most odoriferous pigments upon the board; fill the largest horns; Templars and abbots love good wines and good measure. Elgitha, let thy Lady Rowena know

1 Horns. These were drinks used by the Saxons, as we are informed by Mr. Turner (History of the Anglo-Saxons): Morat was made of honey flavored with the juice of mulberries. Pigment was a sweet and rich liquor, composed of wine highly spiced, and sweetened also with honey; the other liquors need no explanation. T. T. [Scott].

ll not this night expect her in the hall, unless such especial pleasure."

at it will be her especial pleasure," answered she, with great readiness, "for she is ever desirous to hear the latest news from Palestine."

Eric darted at the forward damsel a glance of hasty consent; but Rowena and whatever belonged to her privileged, and secure from his anger. He only re-
"Silence, maiden; thy tongue outruns thy discretion. A message to thy mistress, and let her do her pleasure. At least, the descendant of Alfred still reigns a prinitha left the apartment.

Palestine!" repeated the Saxon—"Palestine! how many are turned to the tales which dissolve crusaders of critical pilgrims bring from that fatal land! I too ask—I too might inquire—I too might listen with bated heart to fables which the wily strollers devise to get us into hospitality; but no—the son who has disme me is no longer mine; nor will I concern myself for his fate than for that of the most worthless among millions that ever shaped the cross on their shoulder, and called it an abjuration of the will of God."

knit his brows, and fixed his eyes for an instant on the ground; as he raised them, the folding doors at the end of the hall were cast wide, and preceded by the domo with his wand, and four domestics bearing torches, the guests of the evening entered the hall.
CHAPTER IV

With sheep and shaggy goats the porkers bled,
And the proud steer was on the marble spread;
With fire prepared, they deal the morsels round,
Wine rosy bright the brimming goblets crown'd.

Disposed apart, Ulysses shares the treat;
A trivet table and ignobler seat,
The Prince assigns——

Odyssey, Book XXI.

The Prior Aymer had taken the opportunity afforded him of changing his riding robe for one of yet more costly materials, over which he wore a cope\(^1\) curiously embroidered. Besides the massive golden signet ring which marked his ecclesiastical dignity, his fingers, though contrary to the canon,\(^2\) were loaded with precious gems; his sandals were of the finest leather which was imported from Spain; his beard trimmed to as small dimensions as his order would possibly permit, and his shaven crown concealed by a scarlet cap richly embroidered.

The appearance of the Knight Templar was also changed; and though less studiously bedecked with ornament, his dress was as rich, and his appearance far more commanding, than that of his companion. He had exchanged his shirt of mail for an under tunic of dark purple silk, garnished with furs, over which flowed his long robe of spotless white in ample folds. The eight-pointed cross of his order was cut on the shoulder of his mantle in black velvet. The high cap no longer invested his brows, which were only shaded by short and thick curled hair of a raven

---

\(^1\) Cope. A long cape worn by the clergy.

\(^2\) Canon. A system of rules for the government of a religious order.
blackness, corresponding to his unusually swart complexion. Nothing could be more gracefully majestic than his step and manner, had they not been marked by a predominant air of haughtiness, easily acquired by the exercise of unresisted authority.

These two dignified persons were followed by their respective attendants, and at a more humble distance by their guide, whose figure had nothing more remarkable than it derived from the usual weeds of a pilgrim. A cloak or mantle of coarse black serge enveloped his whole body. It was in shape something like the cloak of a modern hussar, having similar flaps for covering the arms, and was called a "sclavyn," or "sclavonian." Coarse sandals, bound with thongs, on his bare feet; a broad and shadowy hat, with cockle-shells\(^1\) stitched on its brim, and a long staff shod with iron, to the upper end of which was attached a branch of palm, completed the Palmer's attire. He followed modestly the last of the train which entered the hall, and, observing that the lower table scarce afforded room sufficient for the domestics of Cedric and the retinue of his guests, he withdrew to a settle placed beside, and almost under, one of the large chimneys, and seemed to employ himself in drying his garments, until the retreat of some one should make room at the board, or the hospitality of the steward should supply him with refreshments in the place he had chosen apart.

Cedric rose to receive his guests with an air of dignified hospitality, and, descending from the dais, or elevated part of his hall, made three steps towards them, and then awaited their approach.

"I grieve," he said, "reverend Prior, that my vow binds me to advance no farther upon this floor of my fathers, even to receive such guests as you and this valiant Knight of the Holy Temple. But my steward has expounded to you the cause of my seeming discourtesy. Let me also pray that you will excuse my speaking to you in my native language, and that you will reply in the same if your knowledge of it permits; if not, I sufficiently understand Norman to follow your meaning."

\(^1\) Cockleshells. Sea-shells; used as a sign of pilgrimage to some distant shrine.

"Vows," said the Abbot, "must be unloosed, worthy franklin, or permit me rather to say, worthy thane, though the title is antiquated. Vows are the knots which tie us to Heaven—they are the cords which bind the sacrifice to the horns of the altar—and are therefore, as I said before, to be unloosed and discharged, unless our Holy Mother Church shall pronounce the contrary. And respecting language, I willingly hold communication in that spoken by my respected grandmother, Hilda of Middleham, who died in odour of sanctity, little short, if we may presume to say so, of her glorious namesake, the blessed Saint Hilda of Whitby—God be gracious to her soul!"

When the Prior had ceased what he meant as a conciliatory harangue, his companion said briefly and emphatically, "I speak ever French, the language of King Richard and his nobles; but I understand English sufficiently to communicate with the natives of the country."

Cedric darted at the speaker one of those hasty and impatient glances which comparisons between the two rival nations seldom failed to call forth; but, recollecting the duties of hospitality, he suppressed further show of resentment, and, motioning with his hand, caused his guests to assume two seats a little lower than his own, but placed close beside him, and gave a signal that the evening meal should be placed upon the board.

While the attendants hastened to obey Cedric's commands, his eye distinguished Gurth, the swineherd, who, with his companion Wamba, had just entered the hall. "Send these loitering knaves up hither," said the Saxon.

\(^1\) Saint Hilda. A famous abbess who founded the monastery of Whitby (c. 658), a place noted as a seat of piety and learning in the first period of our literature.
tly. And when the culprits came before the dais comes it, villains,¹ that you have loitered abroad this? Hast thou brought home thy charge, sir-th, or hast thou left them to robbers and ma-herd is safe, so please ye," said Gurth.
it does not please me, thou knave," said Cedric, should be made to suppose otherwise for two hours, were devising vengeance against my neighbours for they have not done me. I tell thee, shackles and on-house shall punish the next offence of this kown his master's irritable temper, at no exculpation; but the Jester, who could pre on Cedric's tolerance, by virtue of his privileges replied for them both—"In troth, uncle³ Cedric, neither wise nor reasonable to-night."
't, sir!" said his master; "you shall to the porter's d taste of the discipline there if you give your ch license."
't let your wisdom tell me," said Wamba, "is it reasonable to punish one person for the fault of ainly not, fool," answered Cedric.
on why should you shackle poor Gurth, uncle, for of his dog Fangs? for I dare be sworn we lost mute by the way, when we had got our herd to-which Fangs did not manage until we heard the 'll hang up Fangs," said Cedric, turning hastily he swineherd, "if the fault is his, and get thee dog."

¹a. Not always used in precisely the modern sense; originally a equivalent to thrall or serf, and derived from Latin vīlla, a farm.

²a. A word used in anger or contempt; sometimes also with a hu-

³a. Used by jesters in place of "master"; also a familiar title of ication than now.
"Under favour, uncle," said the Jester, "that were slight somewhat on the bow-hand\textsuperscript{1} of fair justice; for it was not the fault of Fangs that he was lame and could not gather the herd, but the fault of those that struck off two of his fore claws, an operation for which, if the poor fellow had been consulted, he would scarce have given his voice."

"And who dared to lame an animal which belonged to my bondsman?" said the Saxon, kindling in wrath.

"Marry, that did old Hubert," said Wamba, "Sir Philip de Malvoisin's keeper of the chase. He caught Fangs strolling in the forest, and said he chased the deer contrary to his master's right, as warden of the walk."

"The foul fiend take Malvoisin," answered the Saxon;
"and his keeper both! I will teach them that the wood was disforested in terms of the great Forest Charter.\textsuperscript{2} But enough of this. Go to, knave,—go to thy place; and thou, Gurth, get thee another dog, and should the keeper touch it, I will mar his archery; the curse of a coward on my head, if I strike not off the forefinger of his right hand! he shall draw bowstring no more. I crave your pa don, my worthy guests. I am beset here with neighbours that match your infidels, Sir Knight, in Holy Land. But your homely fare is before you; feed, and let welcome make amends for hard fare."

The feast, however, which was spread upon the board needed no apologies from the lord of the mansion. Swine's flesh, dressed in several modes, appeared on the lower part of the board, as also that of fowls, deer, goats, and hares;
and various kinds of fish, together with huge loaves and cakes of bread, and sundry confections made of fruits and honey. The smaller sorts of wild-fowl, of which there was abundance, were not served up in platters, but brought in \textsuperscript{1} Bow-hand. The left hand held the bow, while the string was drawn with the right.

\textsuperscript{2} Forest Charter. This is another misstatement of fact: the Great Charter was not drawn up till 1215, later than the time of Ivanhoe. De-forested means freed from the strict law of the forest: made public. See Green's Short History, chap. III, sec. III.
on small wooden spits or broaches, and offered by the pages and domestics who bore them to each guest in succession, who cut from them such a portion as he pleased.
Side each person of rank was placed a goblet of silver;
the lower board was accommodated with large drinking-

When the repast was about to commence, the major-mo, or steward, suddenly raising his wand, said aloud:
"Forbear! Place for the Lady Rowena." A side-door at the upper end of the hall now opened behind the banquet
table, and Rowena, followed by four female attendants, entered the apartment. Cedric, though surprised, and perhaps not altogether agreeably so, at his ward appearing public on this occasion, hastened to meet her, and to conduct her, with respectful ceremony, to the elevated seat his own right hand appropriated to the lady of the manson. All stood up to receive her; and, replying to their courtesy by a mute gesture of salutation, she moved gracefully forward to assume her place at the board. Ere she did time to do so, the Templar whispered to the Prior:
"I shall wear no collar of gold of yours at the tournament.
I fancy wine is your own."

"Said I not so?" answered the Prior; "but check your aptitudes, the franklin observes you."

Unheeding this remonstrance, and accustomed only to act upon the immediate impulse of his own wishes, Brian Bois-Guilbert kept his eyes riveted on the Saxon beauty, more striking perhaps to his imagination because differing dely from those of the Eastern sultanas.

Formed in the best proportions of her sex, Rowena was ing stature, yet not so much so as to attract observation account of superior height. Her complexion was ex-
"ibly fair, but the noble cast of her head and features vented the insipidity which sometimes attaches to fair uties. Her clear blue eye, which sate enshrined beneath graceful eyebrow of brown, sufficiently marked to give expression to the forehead, seemed capable to kindle as well as melt, to command as well as to beseech. If mildness were the more natural expression of such a combination of features, it was plain that, in the present instance, the exercise of habitual superiority, and the reception of general homage, had given to the Saxon lady a loftier character, which mingled with and qualified that bestowed by nature. Her profuse hair, of a colour betwixt brown and flaxen, was arranged in a fanciful and graceful manner in numerous ringlets, to form which art had probably aided nature. These locks were braided with gems, and being worn at full length, intimated the noble birth and free-born condition of the maiden. A golden chain, to which was attached a small reliquary\textsuperscript{1} of the same metal, hung round her neck. She wore bracelets on her arms, which were bare. Her dress was an under-gown and kirtle of pale sea-green silk, over which hung a long loose robe, which reached to the ground, having very wide sleeves, which came down, however, very little below the elbow. This robe was crimson, and manufactured out of the very finest wool. A veil of silk, interwoven with gold, was attached to the upper part of it, which could be, at the wearer's pleasure, either drawn over the face and bosom after the Spanish fashion, or disposed as a sort of drapery round the shoulders.

When Rowena perceived the Knight Templar's eyes bent on her with an ardour that, compared with the dark caverns under which they moved, gave them the effect of lighted charcoal, she drew with dignity the veil around her face, as an intimation that the determined freedom of his glance was disagreeable.

Cedric saw the motion and its cause. "Sir Templar," said he, "the cheeks of our Saxon maidens have seen too little of the sun to enable them to bear the fixed glance of a crusader."

\textsuperscript{1} Reliquary. A casket for sacred relics.
I have offended,” replied Sir Brian, “I crave your pardon—that is, I crave the Lady Rowena’s pardon, for my pride will carry me no lower.”

“Let us hope, nevertheless,” said the Prior, “our company determine you to travel thitherward; when the road is so unsafe, the escort of Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert must be despised.”

Mr. Prior,” answered the Saxon, “wheresoever I have ed in this land, I have hitherto found myself, with the assistance of my good sword and faithful followers, in need of other aid. At present, if we indeed go to Ashby-de-la-Zouche, we do so with my noble lord and countryman, Athelstane of Coningsburgh, with such a train as would set outlaws and feudal enemies to flight. I drink to you, Sir Prior, in this cup of which I trust your taste will approve, and I thank you for your courtesy. Should you be so rigid in adhering to this rule,” he added, “as to prefer your acid preparation of milk, I hope you will not strain courtesy to do so.”

“Let us order the Mastiff,” said the Priest, laughing, “it is only in our abbey that we confine ourselves to the lac dulce or the lac acidum.

Conversing with the world, we use the world’s wine, and therefore I answer your pledge in this honest and weak liquor to my lay brother.”

And I,” said the Templar, filling his goblet, “drink

---

1. The sense of this passage is “I hope you will not feel compelled to break a rule to honor me.”

wassail\textsuperscript{1} to the fair Rowena;\textsuperscript{2} for since her namesake introduced the word into England, has never been one more worthy of such a tribute. By my faith, I could pardon the unhappy Vortigern, had he half the cause that we now witness for making a shipwreck of his honour and his kingdom."

"I will spare your courtesy, Sir Knight," said Rowena with dignity, and without unveiling herself; "or rather I will tax it so far as to require of you the latest news from Palestine, a theme more agreeable to our English ears than the compliments which your French breeding teaches."

"I have little of importance to say, lady," answered Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, "excepting the confirmed tiding of a truce with Saladin."

He was interrupted by Wamba, who had taken his appropriated seat upon a chair the back of which was decorated with two ass's ears, and which was placed about two steps behind that of his master, who, from time to time, supplied him with victuals from his own trencher; a favour however, which the Jester shared with the favourite dogs of whom, as we have already noticed, there were several in attendance. Here sat Wamba, with a small table before him, his heels tucked up against the bar of the chair, his cheeks sucked up so as to make his jaws resemble a pair of nut-crackers, and his eyes half-shut, yet watching with alertness every opportunity to exercise his licensed foolery.

"These truces with the infidels," he exclaimed, without caring how suddenly he interrupted the stately Templar, "make an old man of me!"

"Go to, knave—how so," said Cedric, his features prepared to receive favourably the expected jest.

\textsuperscript{1} \textit{Wassail}. Saxon \textit{waes hael}; "to your health!" See the Century Dictionary, under \textit{wassail}, for the incident alluded to.

\textsuperscript{2} \textit{Rowena}. Also the name of the daughter of Hengist, wife of Vortigern the Briton.

\textsuperscript{3} \textit{Saladin}. Sultan of Egypt and Syria (1137-93), and Richard’s vigorous enemy. In Scott’s \textit{Talisman}, the story of their conflict, together with the chivalrous nature of Saladin, are vividly described.
use," answered Wamba, "I remember three of my day, each of which was to endure for the course years; so that, by computation, I must be at least and fifty years old."
I warrant you against dying of old age, however," Templar, who now recognised his friend of the will assure you from all deaths but a violent one, ve such directions to wayfarers as you did this the Prior and me."
,sirrah!" said Cedric, "misdirect travellers? We be you whipt; you are at least as much rogue as

by thee, uncle," answered the Jester, "let my folly protect my roguery. I did but make a mistake my right hand and my left; and he might have a greater who took a fool for his counsellor and rsation was here interrupted by the entrance of 's page, who announced that there was a stranger ste, imploring admittance and hospitality.

it him," said Cedric, "be he who or what he may:
ike that which roars without compels even wild o herd with tame, and to seek the protection of r mortal foe, rather than perish by the elements.
ants be ministered to with all care; look to it,
the steward left the banqueting-hall to see the s of his patron obeyed.
CHAPTER V

Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is? — Merchant of Venice.

Oswald, returning, whispered into the ear of his father, "It is a Jew, who calls himself Isaac of York; is it I should marshal him into the hall?"

"Let Gurth do thine office, Oswald," said Wamba, "his usual effrontery: "the swineherd will be a fit usher for the Jew."

"St. Mary," said the Abbot, crossing himself, "an believing Jew, and admitted into this presence!"

"A dog Jew," echoed the Templar, "to approach a fender of the Holy Sepulchre?"

"By my faith," said Wamba, "it would seem the Templars love the Jews' inheritance better than they do their company."

"Peace, my worthy guests," said Cedric; "my hospitality must not be bounded by your dislikes. If Heaven with the whole nation of stiff-necked unbelievers for years than a layman can number, we may endure the presence of one Jew for a few hours. But I constrain not to converse or to feed with him. Let him have a bite and a morsel apart,—unless," he said, smiling, "these ban'd strangers will admit his society."

"Sir Franklin," answered the Templar, "my Saracens are true Moslems, and scorn as much as any Christian to hold intercourse with a Jew."

1 MOSLEMS. Mussulmans; followers of Islam, Mohammedans.
“Now, in faith,” said Wamba, “I cannot see that the shippers of Mahound and Termagaunt¹ have so greatly advantage over the people once chosen of Heaven.”

“He shall sit with thee, Wamba,” said Cedric; “the fool the knave will be well met.”

“The fool,” answered Wamba, raising the relics of a mon² of bacon, “will take care to erect a bulwark against the knave.”

“Hush,” said Cedric, “for here he comes.”

Introverted with little ceremony, and advancing with and hesitation, and many a bow of deep humility, a thin old man, who, however, had lost by the habit of ping much of his actual height, approached the lower of the board. His features, keen and regular, with an line nose, and piercing black eyes; his high and wrin-forehead, and long grey hair and beard, would have considered as handsome, had they not been the marks physiognomy peculiar to a race which, during those ages, was alike detested by the credulous and prejudi- vulgar, and persecuted by the greedy and rapacious ility, and who, perhaps owing to that very hatred and execration, had adopted a national character in which was much, to say the least, mean and unamiable.

The Jew’s dress, which appeared to have suffered con- cably from the storm, was a plain russet cloak of many a, covering a dark purple tunic. He had large boots with fur, and a belt around his waist, which sus- ed a small knife, together with a case for writing ma- ds, but no weapon. He wore a high square yellow cap peculiar fashion, assigned to his nation to distinguish from Christians, and which he doffed with great hu- ty at the door of the hall.

The reception of this person in the hall of Cedric the

¹ Termagaunt: A supposed deity of the Mohammedans, used in medieaval and romances as co-equal with Mahound, or Mohammed. An unfailing idea of this character was his violent temper.

² Mon: French jambon, from jambe, a leg.
Saxon was such as might have satisfied the most prejudiced enemy of the tribes of Israel. Cedric himself coldly nodded in answer to the Jew's repeated salutations, and signed to him to take place at the lower end of the table, where, however, no one offered to make room for him. On the contrary, as he passed along the file, casting a timid, supplicating glance, and turning towards each of those who occupied the lower end of the board, the Saxon domestics squared their shoulders, and continued to devour their supper with great perseverance, paying not the least attention to the wants of the new guest. The attendants of the Abbot crossed themselves, with looks of pious horror, and the very heathen Saracens, as Isaac drew near them, curled up their whiskers with indignation, and laid their hands on their poniards, as if ready to rid themselves by the most desperate means from the apprehended contamination of his nearer approach.

Probably the same motives which induced Cedric to open his hall to this son of a rejected people would have made him insist on his attendants receiving Isaac with more courtesy; but the Abbot had at this moment engaged him in a most interesting discussion on the breed and character of his favourite hounds, which he would not have interrupted for matters of much greater importance than that of a Jew going to bed supperless. While Isaac stood an outcast in the present society, like his people among the nations, looking in vain for welcome or resting place, the Pilgrim, who sat by the chimney, took compassion upon him, and resigned his seat, saying briefly, "Old man, my garments are dried, my hunger is appeased; thou art both wet and fasting." So saying, he gathered together and brought to a flame the decaying brands which lay scattered on the ample hearth; took from the larger board a mess of pottage and seethed kid, placed it upon the small table at which he had himself supped, and, without wait-the Jew's, thanks, went to the other side of the hall, from unwillingness to hold more close communion with the object of his benevolence, or from a wish to draw near to the upper end of the table, seemed unin.

Had there been painters in those days capable to execute such a subject, the Jew, as he bent his withered form expanded his chilled and trembling hands over the fire, and have formed no bad emblematical personification of Winter season. Having dispelled the cold, he turned eagerly to the smoking mess which was placed before him, ate with a haste and an apparent relish that seemed a token long abstinence from food.

Meanwhile the Abbot and Cedric continued their discourse upon hunting; the Lady Rowena seemed engaged in conversation with one of her attendant females; and the mighty Templar, whose eye seemed to wander from the to the Saxon beauty, revolved in his mind thoughts which appeared deeply to interest him.

"I marvel, worthy Cedric," said the Abbot, as their discourse proceeded, "that, great as your predilection is for your own manly language, you do not receive the Norman-" "And the Saxon beauty, revolved in his mind thoughts which appeared deeply to interest him."

"I marvel, worthy Cedric," said the Abbot, as their discourse proceeded, "that, great as your predilection is for your own manly language, you do not receive the Norman-"

"I marvel, worthy Cedric," said the Abbot, as their discourse proceeded, "that, great as your predilection is for your own manly language, you do not receive the Norman-"

Echeate. The signal given with the horn to call the dogs from a falseMonte, the signal of the death of the game; Curée, the portion to the dogs; Arbor, the vitals; Nombres, the entrails.
without using the new-fangled jargon of curée, arbor, nobiles, and all the babble of the fabulous Sir Tristrem."

"The French," said the Templar, raising his voice with the presumptuous and authoritative tone which he used upon all occasions, "is not only the natural language of the chase, but that of love and of war, in which ladies should be won and enemies defyed."

"Pledge me in a cup of wine, Sir Templar," said Cedric, "and fill another to the Abbot, while I look back some thirty years to tell you another tale. As Cedric the Saxon then was, his plain English tale needed no garnish from French troubadours when it was told in the ear of beauty; and the field of Northallerton, upon the day of the Holy Standard, could tell whether the Saxon war-cry was not heard as far within the ranks of the Scottish host as the cri de guerre of the boldest Norman baron. To the memory of the brave who fought there! Pledge me, my guests." He drank deep, and went on with increasing warmth: "Ay, that was a day of cleaving of shields, when a hundred banners were bent forward over the heads of the valiant, and blood flowed round like water, and death was held better than flight. A Saxon bard had called it a feast of the swords—a gathering of the eagles to the prey—the clashing of bills upon shield and helmet, the shouting of battle more joyful than the clamour of a bridal. But

---

1 Sir Tristrem. There was no language which the Normans more formally separated from that of common life than the terms of the chase. The objects of their pursuit, whether bird or animal, changed their name each year, and there were a hundred conventional terms, to be ignorant of which was to be without one of the distinguishing marks of a gentleman. The reader may consult Dame Juliana Berners' book on the subject. The origin of this science was imputed to the celebrated Sir Tristrem, famous for his tragic intrigue with the beautiful Ysolt. As the Normans reserved the amusement of hunting strictly to themselves, the terms of this formal jargon were all taken from the French language. [Scott].

2 Northallerton. The Battle of the Standard, so called, was fought here in 1138, when the Normans and the Scots were defeated by the Saxons. For significance of the name, see Green's Short History, Chap. II., Sec. VII.

3 Cri de Guerre. War-cry.

4 Saxon Bard. As an illustration of the war poems of these bards, read Tennyson's translation entitled "The Battle of Brunanburh."

5 Bills. Broad-swords: later, the same term was applied to a weapon like a pike or spear, with a hook-shaped blade just below the sharp point.
bards are no more,” he said; “our deeds are lost in those another race; our language—our very name—is hasten-to decay, and none mourns for it save one solitary old man. Cupbearer! knave, fill the goblets. To the strong in us, Sir Templar, be their race or language what it will, now bear them best in Palestine among the champions
the Cross!”

“It becomes not one wearing this badge to answer,” said Brian de Bois-Guilbert; “yet to whom, besides the champions of the Holy Sepulchre, can the palm be signed among the champions of the Cross?”

“To the Knights Hospitallers,” said the Abbot; “I have brother of their order.”

“I impeach not their fame,” said the Templar; “never-less——”

“I think, friend Cedric,” said Wamba, interfering, “that Richard of the Lion’s Heart been wise enough to have ten a fool’s advice, he might have staid at home with his erry Englishmen, and left the recovery of Jerusalem to those same Knights who had most to do with the loss of it.”

“Were there, then, none in the English army,” said the Rowena, “whose names are worthy to be mentioned with the Knights of the Temple and of St. John?”

“Forgive me, lady,” said De Bois-Guilbert; “the English monarch did indeed bring to Palestine a host of gallant riors, second only to those whose breasts have been the ceasing bulwark of that blessed land.”

“Second to none,” said the Pilgrim, who had stood near ough to hear, and had listened to this conversation with arked impatience. All turned towards the spot from hence this unexpected asseveration was heard. “I say,” ated the Pilgrim in a firm and strong voice, “that the ghish chivalry were second to none who ever drew

1 KNIGHTS HOSPITALLERS. See note, page 62.
2 THOSE SAME KNIGHTS. The Knights Hospitallers and the Knights templars, who, sworn by their vows to defend Jerusalem from the infidels, teated and driven from the city by Saladin in 1191.
sword in defence of the Holy Land. I say besides, for I saw it, that King Richard himself, and five of his Knights, held a tournament after the taking of St. John-de-Acre as challengers against all comers. I say that, on that day, each knight ran three courses, and cast to the ground three antagonists. I add, that seven of these assailants were Knights of the Temple; and Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert well knows the truth of what I tell you."

It is impossible for language to describe the bitter scowl of rage which rendered yet darker the swarthy countenance of the Templar. In the extremity of his resentment and confusion, his quivering fingers gripped towards the handle of his sword, and perhaps only withdrew from the consciousness that no act of violence could be safely executed in that place and presence. Cedric, whose feelings were all of a right onward and simple kind, and were seldom occupied by more than one object at once, omitted, in the joyous glee with which he heard of the glory of his countrymen, to remark the angry confusion of his guest. "I would give thee this golden bracelet, Pilgrim," he said, "couldst thou tell me the names of those knights who upheld so gallantly the renown of merry England."

"That will I do blythely," replied the Pilgrim, "and without guerdon; my oath, for a time, prohibits me from touching gold."

"I will wear the bracelet for you, if you will, friend Palmer," said Wamba.

"The first in honour as in arms, in renown as in place," said the Pilgrim, "was the brave Richard, King of England."

"I forgive him," said Cedric— "I forgive him his descent from the tyrant Duke William."

"The Earl of Leicester was the second," continued the Pilgrim. "Sir Thomas Multon of Gilsland was the third."

"Of Saxon descent, he at least," said Cedric, with exultation.
“Sir Foulk Doilly the fourth,” proceeded the Pilgrim. “Saxon also, at least by the mother’s side,” continued Cedric, who listened with the utmost eagerness, and forgot, in part at least, his hatred to the Normans in the common triumph of the King of England and his islanders. “And who was the fifth?” he demanded.

“The fifth was Sir Edwin Turneham.”

“Genuine Saxon, by the soul of Hengist!” shouted Cedric. “And the sixth?” he continued, with eagerness—‘how name you the sixth?’"

“The sixth,” said the Palmer, after a pause, in which he seemed to recollect himself, “was a young knight of lesser renown and lower rank, assumed into that honourable company less to aid their enterprise than to make up their number; his name dwells not in my memory.”

“Sir Palmer,” said Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, scornfully, “this assumed forgetfulness, after so much has been remembered, comes too late to serve your purpose. I will myself tell the name of the knight before whose lance fortune and my horse’s fault occasioned my falling: it was the Knight of Ivanhoe; nor was there one of the six that, for his years, had more renown in arms. Yet this will I say, and loudly—that were he in England, and durst repeat, in this week’s tournament, the challenge of St. John-de-Acre, I, mounted and armed as I now am, would give him every advantage of weapons, and abide the result.”

“Your challenge would be soon answered,” replied the Palmer, “were your antagonist near you. As the matter is, disturb not the peaceful hall with vaunts of the issue of a conflict which you well know cannot take place. If Ivanhoe ever returns from Palestine, I will be his surety that he meets you.”

“A goodly security!” said the Knight Templar; “and what do you proffer as a pledge?”

“This reliquary,” said the Palmer, taking a small ivory box from his bosom, and crossing himself, “containing a portion of the true cross, brought from the monastery of Mount Carmel."\(^1\)

The Prior of Jorvaulx crossed himself and repeated a paternoster,\(^2\) in which all devoutly joined, excepting the Jew, the Mahomedans, and the Templar; the latter of whom, without vailing his bonnet\(^3\) or testifying any reverence for the alleged sanctity of the relic, took from his neck a gold chain, which he flung on the board, saying,
"Let Prior Aymer hold my pledge and that of this nameless vagrant, in token that, when the Knight of Ivanhoe comes within the four seas of Britain, he underlies\(^4\) the challenge of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, which, if he answer not, I will proclaim him as a coward on the walls of every Temple court in Europe."

"It will not need," said the Lady Rowena, breaking silence: "my voice shall be heard, if no other in this hall is raised, in behalf of the absent Ivanhoe. I affirm he will meet fairly every honourable challenge. Could my weak warrant add security to the inestimable pledge of this holy pilgrim, I would pledge name and fame that Ivanhoe gives this proud knight the meeting he desires."

A crowd of conflicting emotions seemed to have occupied Cedric and kept him silent during this discussion.
Gratified pride, resentment, embarrassment, chased each other over his broad and open brow, like the shadow of clouds drifting over a harvest-field; while his attendants, on whom the name of the sixth knight seemed to produce an effect almost electrical, hung in suspense upon their

---

\(^1\) Mount Carmel. This monastery was founded in Palestine in the twelfth century; the order of the Carmelites was instituted there in 1207.

\(^2\) Pater Noster. The beginning of the Lord's Prayer in the Latin version; similarly the Latin words which form the beginning of the various prayers and hymns of the Church are used as titles; thus, an Ave (two syllables) is a prayer to the Virgin, which begins "Ave Maria." "Hail Mary"; the Credo is the creed which begins "Credo in unum Deum."

\(^3\) Bonnet. This means "without removing his cap"; but how was the Templar equipped in this respect? Compare the author's description of his appearance at the beginning of chapter IV.

\(^4\) Underlies. A peculiar use of the word; "is liable to."
er's looks. But when Rowena spoke, the sound of her seemed to startle him from his silence.
Lady," said Cedric, "this beseems not; were further necesary, I myself, offended, and justly offended, am, would yet gage my honour for the honour of Ivan-
But the wager of battle is complete, even accord-to the fantastic fashions of Norman chivalry. Is it not, her Aymer?"
It is," replied the Prior; "and the blessed relic and chain will I bestow safely in the treasury of our con-until the decision of this warlike challenge." Having thus spoken, he crossed himself again and
, and after many genuflections and muttered prayers, delivered the reliquary to Brother Ambrose, his attend-monk, while he himself swept up with less ceremony, perhaps with no less internal satisfaction, the golden
, and bestowed it in a pouch lined with perfumed er, which opened under his arm. "And now, Sir ic," he said, "my ears are chiming vespers with the th of your good wine: permit us another pledge to welfare of the Lady Rowena, and indulge us with lib-to pass to our repose."

By the rood\footnote{1} of Bromholme," said the Saxon, "you at small credit to your fame, Sir Prior! Report speaks a bonny monk, that would hear the matin chime ere he ed his bowl; and, old as I am, I feared to have en you. But, by my faith, a Saxon of twelve, in my time, would not so soon have relin-hed his goblet."

The Prior had his own reasons, however, for persevering the course of temperance which he had adopted. He not only a professional peacemaker, but from practice er of all feuds and brawls. It was not altogether from to his neighbour, or to himself, or from a mixture of
. On the present occasion, he had an instinctive apprehension of the fiery temper of the Saxon, and saw the danger that the reckless and presumptuous spirit of which his companion had already given so many proofs might at length produce some disagreeable explosion. He therefore gently insinuated the incapacity of the native of any other country to engage in the genial conflict of the bowl with the hardy and strong-headed Saxons; something he mentioned, but slightly, about his own holy character, and ended by pressing his proposal to depart to repose.

The grace-cup¹ was accordingly served round, and the guests, after making deep obeisance to their landlord and to the Lady Rowena, arose and mingled in the hall, while the heads of the family, by separate doors, retired with their attendants.

"Unbelieving dog," said the Templar to Isaac the Jew, as he passed him in the throng, "dost thou bend thy course to the tournament?"

"I do so propose," replied Isaac, bowing in all humility,
"if it please your reverend valour."

"Ay," said the knight, "to gnaw the bowels of our nobles with usury, and to gull women and boys with gauds and toys: I warrant thee store of shekels in thy Jewish scrip."

"Not a shekel, not a silver penny, not a halfling,² so help me the God of Abraham!" said the Jew, clasping his hands.
"I go but to seek the assistance of some brethren of my tribe to aid me to pay the fine which the Exchequer of the Jews³ have imposed upon me, Father Jacob be my speed! I am an impoverished wretch: the very gaberdine⁴
I wear is borrowed from Reuben of Tadcaster."

¹ Grace-cup. The cup of wine served at parting.
² Halfling. Half-penny.
³ Exchequer of the Jews. In those days the Jews were subjected to an Exchequer, specially dedicated to that purpose, and which laid them under the most exorbitant impositions. L. T. [Scott].
⁴ Gaberdine. A coarse outer garment worn by the Jews in the Middle Ages.
Templar smiled sourly as he replied, "Beshrew\(^1\) a false-hearted liar!" and passing onward, as if farther conference, he communed with his slaves in a language unknown to the bystanders. An Israelite seemed so staggered by the address of a monk, that the Templar had passed on to the roof of the hall ere he raised his head from the humble which he had assumed, so far as to be sensible of ture. And when he did look around, it was with aished air of one at whose feet a thunderbolt has t, and who hears still the astounding report ringears.

Templar and Prior were shortly after marshalled sleeping apartments by the steward and the cu-chach attended by two torchbearers and two serv-ving refreshments, while servants of inferior con-dicated to their retinue and to the other guestsective places of repose.

w. A mild curse; from an old English word meaning "to en-
CHAPTER VI

To buy his favour I extend this friendship:
If he will take it, so; if not, adieu;
And, for my love, I pray you wrong me not.

Merchant of Venice.

As the Palmer, lighted by a domestic with a torch, past through the intricate combination of apartments of this large and irregular mansion, the cupbearer, coming behind him, whispered in his ear, that if he had no objection to a cup of good mead in his apartment, there were many domestics in that family who would gladly hear the news he had brought from the Holy Land, and particularly that which concerned the Knight of Ivanhoe. Wamba presently appeared to urge the same request, observing that a cup after midnight was worth three after curfew. Without disputing a maxim urged by such grave authority, the Palmer thanked them for their courtesy, but observed that he had included in his religious vow an obligation never to speak in the kitchen on matters which were prohibited in the hall.

"That vow," said Wamba to the cupbearer, "would scarce suit a serving-man."

The cupbearer shrugged up his shoulders in displeasure. "I thought to have lodged him in the solere chamber," said he; "but since he is so unsocial to Christians, e'en let him take the next stall to Isaac the Jew's. Anwold," said he to the torch-bearer, "carry the Pilgrim to the southern cell. I give you good-night," he added, "Sir Palmer, with small thanks for short courtesy."

Solese Chamber. An upper chamber accessible to sunlight.
night, and Our Lady’s benison!” said the whith composure; and his guide moved forward.
small ante-chamber, into which several doors nd which was lighted by a small iron lamp, they and appeared interruption from the waiting-maid of who, saying in a tone of authority that her mis-red to speak with the Palmer, took the torch hand of Anwold, and, bidding him await her rele a sign to the Palmer to follow. Apparently not think it proper to decline this invitation as he
the former; for, though his gesture indicated rise at the summons, he obeyed it without answer trance.
rt passage, and an ascent of seven steps, each of s composed of a solid beam of oak, led him to ent of the Lady Rowena, the rude magnificence corresponded to the respect which was paid to lord of the mansion. The walls were covered rodered hangings, on which different-coloured woven with gold and silver threads, had been
, with all the art of which the age was capable, tent the sports of hunting and hawking. The adorned with the same rich tapestry, and sur-with curtains dyed with purple. The seats had stained coverings, and one, which was higher est, was accommodated with a footstool of ivory, carved.
wser than four silver candelabras, holding great ches, served to illuminate this apartment. Yet odern beauty envy the magnificence of a Saxon
. The walls of the apartment were so ill-finished ill of crevices, that the rich hangings shook to blast, and, in despite of a sort of screen intended them from the wind, the flame of the torches ideways into the air, like the unfurled pennon of . Magnificence there was, with some rude attempt at taste; but of comfort there was little, and, being unknown, it was unmissed.

The Lady Rowena, with three of her attendants standing at her back, and arranging her hair ere she lay down to rest, was seated in the sort of throne already mentioned and looked as if born to exact general homage. The Pilgrim acknowledged her claim to it by a low genuflection.

"Rise, Palmer," said she graciously. "The defender of the absent has a right to favourable reception from all who value truth and honour manhood." She then said to her train, "Retire, excepting only Elgitha; I would speak with this holy Pilgrim."

The maidens, without leaving the apartment, retired to its further extremity, and sat down on a small bench against the wall, where they remained mute as statues though at such a distance that their whispers could not interrupt the conversation of their mistress.

"Pilgrim," said the lady, after a moment's pause, during which she seemed uncertain how to address him, "this night mentioned a name—I mean," she said with some degree of effort, "the name of Ivanhoe—in the halls where by nature and kindred it should have sounded most acceptably; and yet such is the perverse course of fate, that many whose hearts must have throbbed at the sound, I dare ask you where, and in what condition, you left him of whom you spoke? We heard that, having remained in Palestine, on account of his impaired health, after the parture of the English army, he had experienced the persecution of the French faction, to whom the Templars were known to be attached."

"I know little of the Knight of Ivanhoe," answered Palmer, with a troubled voice. "I would I knew him better, since you, lady, are interested in his fate. He has I believe, surmounted the persecution of his enemies in Palestine, and is on the eve of returning to England, wh ou, lady, must know better than I what is his chance of happiness."
IVANHOE

The Lady Rowena sighed deeply, and asked more particularly when the Knight of Ivanhoe might be expected to return to his native country, and whether he would not be exposed to great dangers by the road. On the first point, the Palmer professed ignorance; on the second, he said that the voyage might be safely made by the way of Venice and Genoa, and from thence through France to England. "Ivanhoe," he said, "was so well acquainted with the language and manners of the French, that there was no fear of his incurring any hazard during that part of his travels."

"Would to God," said the Lady Rowena, "he were here safely arrived, and able to bear arms in the approaching journey, in which the chivalry of this land are expected to display their address and valour. Should Athelstane of Coningsburgh obtain the prize, Ivanhoe is like to hear evil tidings when he reaches England. How looked he, stranger, when you last saw him? Had disease laid her hand heavy upon his strength and comeliness?"

"He was darker," said the Palmer, "and thinner than then he came from Cyprus in the train of Cœur-de-Lion, and care seemed to sit heavy on his brow; but I approached not his presence, because he is unknown to me."

"He will," said the lady, "I fear, find little in his native land to clear those clouds from his countenance. Thanks, good Pilgrim, for your information concerning the companion of my childhood. Maidens," she said, "draw near: offer the sleeping-cup to this holy man, whom I will no longer detain from repose."

One of the maidens presented a silver cup containing a rich mixture of wine and spice, which Rowena barely put to her lips. It was then offered to the Palmer, who, after a low obeisance, tasted a few drops.

"Accept this alms, friend," continued the lady, offering a piece of gold, "in acknowledgment of thy painful travail, and of the shrines thou hast visited."

The Palmer received the boon with another low reverence, and followed Elghtha out of the apartment.

In the ante-room he found his attendant Anwold, who, taking the torch from the hand of the waiting-maid, conducted him with more haste than ceremony to an exterior and ignoble part of the building, where a number of small apartments, or rather cells, served for sleeping-places to the lower order of domestics, and to strangers of mean degree.

"In which of these sleeps the Jew?" said the Pilgrim.

"The unbelieving dog," answered Anwold, "kennels in the cell next your holiness. St. Dunstan, how it must be scraped and cleansed ere it be again fit for a Christian!"

"And where sleeps Gurth, the swineherd?" said the stranger.

"Gurth," replied the bondsman, "sleeps in the cell on your right, as the Jew in that to your left; you serve to keep the child of circumcision separate from the abomination of his tribe. You might have occupied a more honourable place had you accepted of Oswald's invitation."

"It is as well as it is," said the Palmer; "the company, even of a Jew, can hardly spread contamination through an oaken partition."

So saying, he entered the cabin allotted to him, and taking the torch from the domestic's hand, thanked him and wished him good-night. Having shut the door of his cell, he placed the torch in a candlestick made of wood, and looked around his sleeping apartment, the furniture of which was of the most simple kind. It consisted of a rude wooden stool, and still ruder hutch or bed-frame, stuffed with clean straw, and accommodated with two or three sheepskins by way of bedclothes.

The Palmer, having extinguished his torch, threw himself, without taking off any part of his clothes, on this ude couch, and slept, or at least retained his recumbent posture, till the earliest sunbeams found their way through the little grated window, which served at once to admit both air and light to his uncomfortable cell. He then started up, and after repeating his matins and adjusting his dress he left it, and entered that of Isaac the Jew, lifting the latch as gently as he could.

The inmate was lying in troubled slumber upon a couch similar to that on which the Palmer himself had passed the night. Such parts of his dress as the Jew had laid aside on the preceding evening were disposed carefully around his person, as if to prevent the hazard of their being carried off during his slumbers. There was a trouble on his brow amounting almost to agony. His hands and arms moved convulsively, as if struggling with the nightmare; and besides several ejaculations in Hebrew, the following were distinctly heard in the Norman-English, or mixed language of the country: "For the sake of the God of Abraham, spare an unhappy old man! I am poor, I am benighted; should your irons wrench my limbs asunder, I would not gratify you!"

The Palmer awaited not the end of the Jew's vision, but stirred him with his pilgrim's staff. The touch probably associated, as is usual, with some of the apprehensions excited by his dream; for the old man started up, his grey hair standing almost erect upon his head, and huddling one part of his garments about him, while he held the detached pieces with the tenacious grasp of a falcon, he fixed upon the Palmer his keen black eyes, expressive of wild surprise and of bodily apprehension.

"Fear nothing from me, Isaac," said the Palmer, "I come as your friend."

"The God of Israel requite you," said the Jew, greatly relieved; "I dreamed—but Father Abraham be praised, it was but a dream!" Then, collecting himself, he added in his usual tone, "And what may it be your pleasure to want at so early an hour with the poor Jew?"

"It is to tell you," said the Palmer, "that if you leave not this mansion instantly, and travel not with some haste, your journey may prove a dangerous one."

"Holy father!" said the Jew, "whom could it interest to endanger so poor a wretch as I am?"

"The purpose you can best guess," said the Pilgrim; "but rely on this, that when the Templar crossed the hall yesternight, he spoke to his Mussulman slaves in the Saracen language, which I well understand, and charged them this morning to watch the journey of the Jew, to seize upon him when at a convenient distance from the mansion, and to conduct him to the castle of Philip de Malvoisin or to that of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf."

It is impossible to describe the extremity of terror which seized upon the Jew at this information, and seemed at once to overpower his whole faculties. His arms fell down to his sides, and his head drooped on his breast, his knees bent under his weight, every nerve and muscle of his frame seemed to collapse and lose its energy, and he sunk at the foot of the Palmer, not in the fashion of one who intentionally stoops, kneels, or prostrates himself to excite compassion, but like a man borne down on all sides by the pressure of some invisible force, which crushes him to the earth without the power of resistance.

"Holy God of Abraham!" was his first exclamation, folding and elevating his wrinkled hands, but without raising his grey head from the pavement; "O holy Moses! O blessed Aaron! the dream is not dreamed for nought, and the vision cometh not in vain! I feel their irons already tear my sinews! I feel the rack pass over my body like the saws, and harrows, and axes of iron over the men of Rabbah, and of the cities of the children of Ammon!"

"Stand up, Isaac, and hearken to me," said the Palmer, who viewed the extremity of his distress with a compassion which contempt was largely mingled; “you have cause for your terror, considering how your brethren have been used, in order to extort from them their hoards, both by princes and nobles; but stand up, I say, and I will point out to you the means of escape. Leave this mansion instantly, while its inmates sleep sound after the last night’s revel. I will guide you by the secret paths of the forest, known as well to me as to any forester that ranges it, and I will not leave you till you are under safe conduct of some chief or baron going to the tournament, whose good-will you have probably the means of securing.”

As the ears of Isaac received the hopes of escape which this speech intimated, he began gradually, and inch by inch, as it were, to raise himself up from the ground, until he fairly rested upon his knees, throwing back his long grey hair and beard, and fixing his keen black eyes upon the Palmer’s face, with a look expressive at once of hope and fear, not unmingled with suspicion. But when he heard the concluding part of the sentence, his original terror appeared to revive in full force, and he dropt once more on his face, exclaiming, “I possess the means of securing good-will! Alas! there is but one road to the favour of a Christian, and how can the poor Jew find it, whom extortions have already reduced to the misery of Lazarus?” Then, as if suspicion had overpowered his other feelings, he suddenly exclaimed, “For the love of God, young man, betray me not; for the sake of the Great father who made us all, Jew as well as Gentile, Israelite and Ishmaelite, do me no treason! I have not means to secure the good-will of a Christian beggar, were he rating at a single penny.” As he spoke these last words, he raised himself and grasped the Palmer’s mantle with a look of the most earnest entreaty. The Pilgrim extricated himself, as if there were contamination in the touch.

“Wert thou loaded with all the wealth of thy tribe,” he said, “what interest have I to injure thee? In this dress I am vowed to poverty, nor do I change it for aught save a horse and a coat of mail. Yet think not that I care for thy company, or propose myself advantage by it; remain here if thou wilt, Cedric the Saxon may protect thee."

"Alas!" said the Jew, "he will not let me travel in his train. Saxon or Norman will be equally ashamed of the poor Israelite; and to travel by myself through the domains of Philip de Malvoisin and Reginald Front-de-Bœuf—— Good youth, I will go with you! Let us haste—let us gird up our loins—let us flee! Here is thy staff, why wilt thou tarry?"

"I tarry not," said the Pilgrim, giving way to the urgency of his companion; "but I must secure the means of leaving this place; follow me."

He led the way to the adjoining cell, which, as the reader is apprised, was occupied by Gurth, the swineherd. "Arise, Gurth," said the Pilgrim—"arise quickly. Undo the postern gate, and let out the Jew and me."

Gurth, whose occupation, though now held so mean, gave him as much consequence in Saxon England as that of Eumæus in Ithaca, was offended at the familiar and commanding tone assumed by the Palmer. "The Jew leaving Rotherwood," said he, raising himself on his elbow and looking superciliously at him, without quitting his pallet, "and travelling in company with the Palmer to boot——"

"I should as soon have dreamt," said Wamba, who entered the apartment at the instant, "of his stealing away with a gammon of bacon."

"Nevertheless," said Gurth, again laying down his head on the wooden log which served him for a pillow, "both Jew and Gentile must be content to abide the opening of the great gate; we suffer no visitors to depart by stealth at these unseasonable hours."

*Postern. The Latin word posterus means in the rear; so postern means rear gate.*
“Nevertheless,” said the Pilgrim, in a commanding one, “you will not, I think, refuse me that favour.”

So saying, he stooped over the bed of the recumbent wineherd, and whispered something in his ear in Saxon. Gurth started up as if electrified. The Pilgrim, raising his finger in an attitude as if to express caution, added, “Gurth, beware; thou art wont to be prudent. I say, undo the postern; thou shalt know more anon.”

With hasty alacrity Gurth obeyed him, while Wamba and the Jew followed, both wondering at the sudden change in the swineherd’s demeanour.

“My mule—my mule!” said the Jew, as soon as they stood without the postern.

“Fetch him his mule,” said the Pilgrim; “and, hearest thou, let me have another that I may bear him company till he is beyond these parts. I will return it safely to some of Cedric’s train at Ashby. And do thou——” he whispered the rest in Gurth’s ear.

“Willingly—most willingly shall it be done,” said Gurth, and instantly departed to execute the commission.

“I wish I knew,” said Wamba, when his comrade’s back was turned, “what you Palmers learn in the Holy Land.”

“To say our orisons, fool,” answered the Pilgrim, “to repent our sins, and to mortify ourselves with fastings, vigils, and long prayers.”

“Something more potent than that,” answered the Jester; “for when would repentance or prayer make Gurth do a courtesy, or fasting or vigil persuade him to lend you a mule? I trow you might as well have told his favourite black boar of thy vigils and penance, and wouldst have gotten as civil an answer.”

“Go to,” said the Pilgrim, “thou art but a Saxon fool.”

“Thou sayest well,” said the Jester; “had I been born a Norman, as I think thou art, I would have had luck on my side, and been next door to a wise man.”

Orisons. Prayers; derived from Latin oro, to pray.
At this moment Gurth appeared on the opposite side of the moat with the mules. The travellers crossed the ditch upon a drawbridge of only two planks' breadth, the narrowness of which was matched with the straitness of the postern, and with a little wicket in the exterior palisade which gave access to the forest. No sooner had they reached the mules, than the Jew, with hasty and trembling hands, secured behind the saddle a small bag of buckram, which he took from under his cloak, containing as he muttered, "a change of raiment—only a change of raiment." Then getting upon the animal with more alacrity and haste than could have been anticipated from his years, he lost no time in so disposing of the skirts of his gaberdine as to conceal completely from observation the burden which he had thus deposited en croupe.

The Pilgrim mounted with more deliberation, reaching as he departed, his hand to Gurth, who kissed it with the utmost possible veneration. The swineherd stood gazing after the travellers until they were lost under the boughs of the forest path, when he was disturbed from his reverie by the voice of Wamba.

"Knowest thou," said the Jester, "my good friend Gurth, that thou art strangely courteous and most unwontedly pious on this summer morning? I would I were a black prior or a barefoot palmer, to avail myself of thy unwonted zeal and courtesy; certes, I would make more out of it than a kiss of the hand."

"Thou art no fool thus far, Wamba," answered Gurth, "though thou arguest from appearances, and the wisest of us can do no more. But it is time to look after my charge."

---

1 Moat. A deep trench surrounding a castle, usually filled with water. Compare page 69.
2 Wicket. A small door, in or near a larger door or gate, for the admission of persons on foot.
3 En Croupe. Behind the saddle.
4 Certes. Certainly.
So saying, he turned back to the mansion, attended by Jester.
Meanwhile the travellers continued to press on their journey with a despatch which argued the extremity of the vile's fears, since persons at his age are seldom fond of id motion. The Palmer, to whom every path and out-in the wood appeared to be familiar, led the way
ough the most devious paths, and more than once ited anew the suspicion of the Israelite that he intended betray him into some ambushade of his enemies.
His doubts might have been indeed pardoned; for, cept perhaps the flying fish, there was no race existing
the earth, in the air, or the waters, who were the object such an unintermitting, general, and relentless persecuthe Jews of this period. Upon the slightest and most unreasonable pretences, as well as upon accusations most absurd and groundless, their persons and property exposed to every turn of popular fury; for Norman, Dane, and Briton, however adverse these races were each other, contended which should look with greatest estation upon a people whom it was accounted a point religion to hate, to revile, to despise, to plunder, and to persecute. The kings of the Norman race, and the inde-ent nobles, who followed their example in all acts of anny, maintained against this devoted people a perseucumortal and calculated, and self-interested kind.
 is a well-known story of King John, that he confined a althy Jew in one of the royal castles, and daily caused one of his teeth to be torn out, until, when the jaw of the happy Israelite was half disfurnished, he consented to a large sum, which it was the tyrant's object to extort om him. The little ready money which was in the ontry was chiefly in possession of this persecuted people, and the nobility hesitated not to follow the example of Filling fish. The filling fish, leaping out of the water to escape the sgells and sea-birds that swoop down on them from above.

their sovereign in wringing it from them by every species of oppression, and even personal torture. Yet the passive courage inspired by the love of gain induced the Jews to dare the various evils to which they were subjected, in consideration of the immense profits which they were enabled to realise in a country naturally so wealthy as England. In spite of every kind of discouragement, and even of the special court of taxations already mentioned, called the Jews' Exchequer, erected for the very purpose of despoiling and distressing them, the Jews increased, multiplied, and accumulated huge sums, which they transferred from one hand to another by means of bills of exchange—an invention for which commerce is said to be indebted to them, and which enabled them to transfer their wealth from land to land, that, when threatened with oppression in one country, their treasure might be secured in another.

The obstinacy and avarice of the Jews, being thus in a measure placed in opposition to the fanaticism and tyranny of those under whom they lived, seemed to increase in proportion to the persecution with which they were visited; and the immense wealth they usually acquired in commerce, while it frequently placed them in danger, was at other times used to extend their influence, and to secure to them a certain degree of protection. On these terms they lived; and their character, influenced accordingly, was watchful, suspicious, and timid—yet obstinate, uncomplying, and skilful in evading the dangers to which they were exposed.

When the travellers had pushed on at a rapid rate through many devious paths, the Palmer at length broke silence.

"That large decayed oak," he said, "marks the boundaries over which Front-de-Bœuf claims authority; we are long since far from those of Malvoisin. There is now no fear of pursuit."

"May the wheels of their chariots be taken off," said Jew, "like those of the host of Pharaoh, that they may heavily! But leave me not, good Pilgrim. Think of that fierce and savage Templar, with his Saracen
; they will regard neither territory, nor manor, nor lip."

"Our road," said the Palmer, "should here separate;
beseems not men of my character and thine to together longer than needs must be. Besides, what couldst thou have from me, a peaceful pilgrim, but two armed heathens?"

"Good youth," answered the Jew, "thou canst defend and I know thou wouldst. Poor as I am, I will requeit with money, for money, so help me my Father Abra-I have none; but——"

"Money and recompense," said the Palmer, interrupt-
"I have already said I require not of thee. Guide and, it may be, even in some sort defend thee; protect a Jew against a Saracen can scarce be ated unworthy of a Christian. Therefore, Jew, I se thee safe under some fitting escort. We are now far from the town of Sheffield, where thou mayest find many of thy tribe with whom to take refuge."

"The blessing of Jacob be upon thee, good youth!" said Jew; "in Sheffield I can harbour with my kinsman and find some means of travelling forth with

"Be it so," said the Palmer; "at Sheffield then we part, half an hour's riding will bring us in sight of that the half hour was spent in perfect silence on both the Pilgrim perhaps disdaining to address the Jew, in case of absolute necessity, and the Jew not pre-
g to force a conversation with a person whose journey
Holy Sepulchre gave a sort of sanctity to his char-
They paused on the top of a gently rising bank, Pilgrim, pointing to the town of Sheffield, which lay beneath them, repeated the words, "Here, then, we part."

"Not till you have had the poor Jew's thanks," said Isaac; "for I presume not to ask you to go with me to my kinsman Zareth's, who might aid me with some means of repaying your good offices."

"I have already said," answered the Pilgrim, "that I desire no recompense. If, among the huge list of thy debtors, thou wilt, for my sake, spare the gyves\(^1\) and the dungeon to some unhappy Christian who stands in thy danger,\(^2\) I shall hold this morning's service to thee well bestowed."

"Stay—stay," said the Jew, laying hold of his garment; "something would I do more than this—something for thyself. God knows the Jew is poor—yes, Isaac is the beggar of his tribe—but forgive me should I guess what thou most lackest at this moment."

"If thou wert to guess truly," said the Palmer, "it is what thou canst not supply, wert thou as wealthy as thou sayst thou art poor."

"As I say!" echoed the Jew. "Oh! believe it, I say but the truth; I am a plundered, indebted, distressed man. Hard hands have wrung from me my goods, my money, my ships, and all that I possessed. Yet I can tell thee what thou lackest, and, it may be, supply it too. Thy wish even now is for a horse and armour."

The Palmer started, and turned suddenly towards the Jew. "What fiend prompted that guess?" said he, hastily.

"No matter," said the Jew, smiling, "so that it be a true one; and, as I can guess thy want, so I can supply it."

"But consider," said the Palmer, "my character, my dress, my vow."

"I know you Christians," replied the Jew, "and that

---

\(^1\) GYVES. Shackles, fetters.

\(^2\) DANGER. Power. Compare Shakspere's use of the word in the Merchant of Venice IV. 1. 180.

"You stand within his danger, do you not?"
he noblest of you will take the staff and sandal in supertitious penance, and walk afoot to visit the graves of dead men."

"Blaspheme not, Jew!" said the Pilgrim, sternly.

"Forgive me," said the Jew; "I spoke rashly. But there dropt words from you last night and this morning that, like sparks from flint, showed the metal within; and in the bosom of that Palmer's gown is hidden a knight's chain and spurs of gold. They glanced as you stooped over my bed in the morning."

The Pilgrim could not forbear smiling. "Were thy garments searched by as curious an eye, Isaac," said he,
"what discoveries might not be made?"

"No more of that," said the Jew, changing colour; and drawing forth his writing materials in haste, as if to stop the conversation, he began to write upon a piece of paper which he supported on the top of his yellow cap, without dismounting from his mule. When he had finished, he delivered the scroll, which was in the Hebrew character, to the Pilgrim, saying, "In the town of Leicester all men know the rich Jew, Kirjath Jairam of Lombardy; give him this scroll. He hath on sale six Milan harnesses, the worst would suit a crowned head; ten goodly steeds, the worst might mount a king, were he to do battle for his throne. Of these he will give thee thy choice, with everything else that can furnish thee forth for the tournament;
when it is over, thou wilt return them safely—unless thou shouldst have wherewith to pay their value to the owner."

"But, Isaac," said the Pilgrim, smiling, "dost thou know that in these sports the arms and steed of the knight who is unhorsed are forfeit to his victor? Now I may be unfortunate, and so lose what I cannot replace or repay."

The Jew looked somewhat astounded at this possibility;
but collecting his courage, he replied hastily, "No—no—
It is impossible—I will not think so. The blessing of Our Father will be upon thee. Thy lance will be powerful as the rod of Moses."

So saying, he was turning his mule’s head away, while the Palmer, in his turn, took hold of his gaberdine. "Nay, thou knowest not all the risk. The steed may be slain, the armour injured; for I will spare neither man. Besides, those of thy tribe give nothing nothing; something there must be paid for their use."

The Jew twisted himself in the saddle, like a man in fit of the colic; but his better feelings predominated over those which were most familiar to him. "I care not," said—"I care not; let me go. If there is damage, it will cost you nothing; if there is usage money, Kirjath Jaim will forgive it for the sake of his kinsman Isaac. Farewell! Yet, hark thee, good youth," said he, turning about—"thrust thyself not too forward into this vain hurry-burr. I speak not for endangering the steed and coat of arms but for the sake of thine own life and limbs."

"Gramercy¹ for thy caution," said the Palmer, smiling; "I will use thy courtesy frankly, and it will hard with me but I will requite it."

They parted, and took different roads for the town of Sheffield.

¹ Gramercy. Corruption of the French grand merci, great thanks.
CHAPTER VII

... with a long retinue of their squires, dy liveries march and quaint attires; ced the helm, another held the lance, d the shining buckler did advance. urser paw'd the ground with restless feet, nting foam'd and champ'd the golden bit. ths and armourers on palfreys ride, in their hands and hammers at their side; ails for loosen'd spears, and thongs for shields provide. men guard the streets in seemly bands; downs come crowding on, with cudgels in their hands. Palamon and Arcite.

The condition of the English nation was at this time etely miserable. King Richard was absent a prison in the power of the perfidious and cruel Duke Austria. Even the very place of his captivity was in, and his fate but very imperfectly known to the city of his subjects, who were, in the mean time, a very species of subaltern oppression.

Since John, in league with Philip of France, Cour's mortal enemy, was using every species of influence the Duke of Austria to prolong the captivity of ther Richard, to whom he stood indebted for so favours. In the mean time, he was strengthening a faction in the kingdom, of which he proposed to the succession, in case of the King's death, with the late heir, Arthur Duke of Brittany, son of Geoffrey renct, the elder brother of John. This usurpation, all known, he afterwards effected. His own character being light, profligate, and perfidious, John easily tached to his person and faction not only all who had reason to dread the resentment of Richard for criminal ceedings during his absence, but also the numerous class-
"lawless resolutes" whom the crusades had turned back their country, accomplished in the vices of the East, poveryished in substance, and hardened in character, and who placed their hopes of harvest in civil commotion.

To these causes of public distress and apprehension must be added the multitude of outlaws who, driven to despair by the oppression of the feudal nobility and the severe exercise of the forest laws, banded together in large gangs, and, keeping possession of the forests and the wastes, set at defiance the justice and magistracy of the country. The nobles themselves, each fortified within his own castle, and playing the petty sovereign over his own dominions, were the leaders of bands scarce less lawless and oppressive than those of the avowed depredators. To maintain these retainers, and to support the extravagance and magnificence which their pride induced them to affect, the nobility borrowed sums of money from the Jews at the most usurious interest, which gnawed into their estates like consuming cankers, scarce to be cured unless the circumstances gave them an opportunity of getting free by exercising upon their creditors some act of unprincipled violence.

Under the various burdens imposed by this unhappy state of affairs, the people of England suffered deeply for the present, and had yet more dreadful cause to fear for the future. To augment their misery, a contagious disorder of a dangerous nature spread through the land; and, rendered more virulent by the uncleanness, the indifferent food, and 1 Lawless Resolutes. Compare Shakspere's Hamlet I. 1. 98.

Now, sir, young Fortinbras
Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there
Sharked up a list of lawless resolutes."

"Now, sir, young Fortinbras
Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there
Sharked up a list of lawless resolutes."
hed lodging of the lower classes, swept off many, as the survivors were tempted to envy, as exempt from the evils which were to come.

Amid these accumulated distresses, the poor as well as the vulgar, as well as the noble, in the event of a tournament, which was the grand spectacle of that age, was much interested as the half-starved citizen of whom has not a real left to buy provisions for his family in the issue of a bull-feast. Neither duty nor could keep youth or age from such exhibitions. The age of arms, as it was called, which was to take place at Ashby, in the county of Leicester, as champions of renown were to take the field in the presence of a nobleman himself, who was expected to grace the lists, did universal attention, and an immense confluence of all ranks hastened upon the appointed place of combat.

The scene was singularly romantic. On the verge of a rich approach to within a mile of the town of which was an extensive meadow of the finest and most green turf, surrounded on one side by the forest, and on the other by straggling oak-trees, some of which grown to an immense size. The ground, as if on purpose for the martial display which was sloped gradually down on all sides to a level which was inclosed for the lists with strong palisading a space of a quarter of a mile in length, and as broad. The form of the inclosure was a square, save that the corners were considerably off, in order to afford more convenience for the The openings for the entry of the combatants were on the northern and southern extremities of the lists, by strong wooden gates, each wide enough to allow horsemen riding abreast. At each of these were stationed two heralds, attended by six trumpets, as many pursuivants, and a strong body of men-at-arms, for maintaining order, and ascertaining the quality of the knights who proposed to engage in this martial game.

On a platform beyond the southern entrance, formed by a natural elevation of the ground, were pitched five magnificent pavilions, adorned with pennons of russet and black, the chosen colours of the five knights challengers. The cords of the tents were of the same colour. Before each pavilion was suspended the shield of the knight by whom it was occupied, and beside it stood his squire quaintly disguised as a salvage or silvan man, or in some other fantastic dress, according to the taste of his master and the character he was pleased to assume during the game. The central pavilion, as the place of honour, had been assigned to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whose renown in all games of chivalry, no less than his connexion with the knights who had undertaken this passage of arms, had occasioned him to be eagerly received into the company of the challengers, and even adopted as their chief and leader, though he had so recently joined them. On one side of his tent were pitched those of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and Richard [Philip] de Malvoisin, and on the other was the pavilion of Hugh de Grantmesnil, a noble baron in the vicinity, whose ancestor had been Lord High Steward of England in the time of the Conqueror and his son William Rufus. Ralph de Vipont, a knight of St. John of Jerusalem, who had some ancient possessions at a place called Heather, near Ashby-de-la-Zouche, occupied the fifth pavilion. From the entrance into the lists a gently sloping passage, ten yards in breadth, led up to the platform on which the tents were pitched. It was strongly secured by a palisade on each side, as was the esplanade in front of the pavilions, and the whole was guarded by men-at-arms.

The northern access to the lists terminated in a similar entrance of thirty feet in breadth, at the extremity of which was a large inclosed space for such knights as might be disposed to enter the lists with the challengers, behind which were placed tents containing refreshments of every kind for their accommodation, with armourers, farriers, and ther attendants, in readiness to give their services wherever they might be necessary.

The exterior of the lists was in part occupied by temporary galleries, spread with tapestry and carpets, and accommodated with cushions for the convenience of those ladies and nobles who were expected to attend the tournament. A narrow space betwixt these galleries and the lists gave accommodation for yeomanry and spectators of a better degree than the mere vulgar, and might be compared to the pit of a theatre. The promiscuous multitude arranged themselves upon large banks of turf prepared for the purpose, which, aided by the natural elevation of the ground, enabled them to overlook the galleries and obtain a fair view into the lists. Besides the accommodation which these stations afforded, many hundreds had perched themselves on the branches of the trees which surrounded the meadow; and even the steeple of a country church, at some distance, was crowded with spectators.

It only remains to notice respecting the general arrangement, that one gallery in the very centre of the eastern side of the lists, and consequently exactly opposite the spot where the shock of the combat was to take place, was raised higher than the others, more richly decorated, and graced by a sort of throne and canopy, on which the royal arms were emblazoned. Squires, pages, and yeomen in rich liveries waited around this place of honour, which was designed for Prince John and his attendants. Opposite to this gallery was another, elevated to the same height, on the western side of the lists; and more gaily, if less sumptuously, decorated than that destined for the Prince himself. A train of pages and of young maidens, the most beautiful who could be selected, gaily dressed in fancy habits of green and pink, surrounded a throne decorated in the same colours. Among pennons and flags bearing wounded hearts, burning hearts, bleeding hearts, bows and quivers, and all the commonplace emblems of the triumphs of Cupid, a blazoned inscription informed the spectators that this seat of honour was designed for La Royne de la Beauté et des Amours. But who was to represent the Queen of Beauty and of Love on the present occasion no one was prepared to guess.

Meanwhile, spectators of every description thronged forward to occupy their respective stations, and not without many quarrels concerning those which they were entitled to hold. Some of these were settled by the men-at-arms with brief ceremony; the shafts of their battle-axes and pummels of their swords being readily employed as arguments to convince the more refractory. Others, which involved the rival claims of more elevated persons, were determined by the heralds, or by the two marshals of the field, William de Wyvil and Stephen de Martival, who, armed at all points, rode up and down the lists to enforce and preserve good order among the spectators.

Gradually the galleries became filled with knights and nobles, in their robes of peace, whose long and rich-tinted mantles were contrasted with the gayer and more splendid habits of the ladies, who, in a greater proportion than even the men themselves, thronged to witness a sport which one would have thought too bloody and dangerous to afford much pleasure. The lower and interior space filled by substantial yeomen and burghers, and he lesser gentry as, from modesty, poverty, or title, durst not assume any higher place. It was amongst these that the most frequent disputes for occurred.

of an unbeliever,” said an old man, whose thread-bore witness to his poverty, as his sword, and his golden chain intimated his pretensions to rank of a she-wolf! darest thou press upon a Christian, man gentleman of the blood of Montdidier?”

rough expostulation was addressed to no other acquaintance Isaac, who, richly and even mag-dressed in a gaber dine ornamented with lace and fur, was endeavoring to make place in the fore-beneath the gallery for his daughter, the bea-utica, who had joined him at Ashby, and who was ing on her father’s arm, not a little terrified by her displeasure which seemed generally excited by his presumption. But Isaac, though we have seen timidly timid on other occasions, knew well that he had nothing to fear. It was not in places of sort, or where their equals were assembled, that sious or malevolent noble durst offer him injury.

meetings the Jews were under the protection of the w; and if that proved a weak assurance, it usually that there were among the persons assembled ons who, for their own interested motives, were act as their protectors. On the present occasion, more than usually confident, being aware that he was even then in the very act of negotiating an from the Jews of York, to be secured upon wels and lands. Isaac’s own share in this trans-considerable, and he well knew that the Prince’s re to bring it to a conclusion would ensure him tition in the dilemma in which he stood.
Emboldened by these considerations, the Jew pursued his point, and jostled the Norman Christian without respect either to his descent, quality, or religion. The complaints of the old man, however, excited the indignation of the bystanders. One of these, a stout well-set yeoman,\(^1\) arrayed in Lincoln green, having twelve arrows stuck in his belt, with a baldric and badge of silver, and a bow of six feet length in his hand, turned short round, and while his countenance, which his constant exposure to weather had rendered brown as a hazel nut, grew darker with anger, he advised the Jew to remember that all the wealth he had acquired by sucking the blood of his miserable victims had but swelled him like a bloated spider, which might be overlooked while it kept in a corner, but would be crushed if it ventured into the light. This intimation, delivered in Norman-English with a firm voice and a stern aspect, made the Jew shrink back; and he would have probably withdrawn himself altogether from a vicinity so dangerous, had not the attention of every one been called to the sudden entrance of Prince John, who at that moment entered the lists, attended by a numerous and gay train, consisting partly of laymen, partly of churchmen, as light in their dress, and as gay in their demeanour, as their companions. Among the latter was the Prior of Jorvaulx, in the most gallant trim which a dignitary of the church could venture to exhibit. Fur and gold were not spared in his garments; and the point of his boots, out-heroding\(^2\) the preposterous fashion of the time, turned up so very far as to be attached not to his knees merely, but to his very girdle, and effectually prevented him from putting

\(^1\) Yeoman. Compare this description with that given by Chaucer in the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, ll. 101-117.

\(^2\) Out-heroding. Exaggerating. In the old miracle-plays the character of Herod was presented with absurdly boisterous declamation, and in Shakespeare's Hamlet, the Prince cautions the players not to overdo their parts (Act III. 2. 16):

"It out-herods Herod: pray you avoid it."

The phrase here used has become proverbial.
foot into the stirrup. This, however, was a slight inconvenience to the gallant Abbot, who, perhaps even excelling in the opportunity to display his accomplished seamanship before so many spectators, especially of the sex, dispensed with the use of these supports to a rider. The rest of Prince John’s retinue consisted the favourite leaders of his mercenary troops, some haughty barons and profligate attendants upon the rest, with several Knights Templars and Knights of St.

It may be here remarked, that the knights of these orders were accounted hostile to King Richard, having chosen the side of Philip of France in the long train of pates which took place in Palestine betwixt that monarch and the lion-hearted King of England. It was the un-known consequence of this discord that Richard’s sonst’s victories had been rendered fruitless, his romantic attempt to besiege Jerusalem disappointed, and the fruit of all the glory which he had acquired had dwindled into an uncertain truce with the Sultan Saladin. With the policy which had dictated the conduct of their thrones in the Holy Land, the Templars and Hospitallers of England and Normandy attached themselves to the claim of Prince John, having little reason to desire the turn of Richard to England, or the succession of Arthur, his legitimate heir. For the opposite reason, Prince John hated and contemned the few Saxon families of consequence which subsisted in England, and omitted no opportunity of mortifying and affronting them; being conscious of his person and pretensions were disliked by them, as well as by the greater part of the English commons, who were farther innovation upon their rights and liberties in a sovereign of John’s licentious and tyrannical disposition.

Attended by this gallant equipage, himself well mounted, and splendidly dressed in crimson and in gold,... bearing upon his hand a falcon, and having his head ered by a rich fur bonnet, adorned with a circle of precistones, from which his long curled hair escaped and o spread his shoulders, Prince John, upon a grey and h mettled palfrey, caracole\textsuperscript{1} within the lists at th of his jovial party, laughing loud with his train, and e with all the boldness of royal criticism the beauties d adorned the lofty galleries.

Those who remarked in the physiognomy of the P a dissolute audacity, mingled with extreme hau
t and indifference to the feelings of others, could no deny to his countenance that sort of comeliness wh belongs to an open set of features, well formed by na modelled by art to the usual rules of courtesy, yet s frank and honest that they seemed as if they disclai conceal the natural workings of the soul. Such an ex sion is often mistaken for manly frankness, when it a rises from the reckless indifference of a libertine p position, conscious of superiority of birth, of wealth, s
some other adventitious advantage, totally uncon with personal merit. To those who did not think d deeply, and they were the greater number by a hundr one, the splendour of Prince John’s \textit{rheno}\textsuperscript{2} (\textit{i.e.}, fur tip the richness of his cloak, lined with the most costly s his maroquin\textsuperscript{3} boots and golden spurs, together with g grace with which he managed his palfrey, were suf merit clamorous applause.

In his joyous caracole round the lists, the atten tion the Prince was called by the commotion, not yet s which had attended the ambitious movement of t wards the higher places of the assembly. The quiet do Prince John instantly recognised the Jew, but was m more agreeably attracted by the beautiful daughter of t

\textsuperscript{1} \textit{Caracole}. Wheeled.
\textsuperscript{2} \textit{Rheno}. Originally skin of the reindeer.
\textsuperscript{3} \textit{Maroquin}. Morocco.
o, terrified by the tumult, clung close to the arm of her father.

The figure of Rebecca might indeed have compared with the proudest beauties of England, even though it had been judged by as shrewd a connoisseur as Prince John. Her form was exquisitely symmetrical, and was shown to advantage by a sort of Eastern dress, which she wore according to the fashion of the females of her nation. Her ban of yellow silk suited well with the darkness of her complexion. The brilliancy of her eyes, the superb arch of her eyebrows, her well-formed aquiline nose, her teeth as white as pearl, and the profusion of her sable tresses, which, when arranged in its own little spiral of twisted curls, fell upon as much of a lovely neck and bosom as a barre of the richest Persian silk, exhibiting flowers in their natural colours embossed upon a purple ground, permitted to be visible—all these constituted a combination of loveliness which yielded not to the most beautiful of the maidens who surrounded her. It is true, that of the seven and pearl-studded clasps which closed her vest from the throat to the waist, the three uppermost were left untied on account of the heat, which something enlarged the prospect to which we allude. A diamond necklace, with pendants of inestimable value, were by this means made more conspicuous. The feather of an ostrich, set in her turban by an agraffe set with brilliants, was another distinction of the beautiful Jewess, scoffed and jeered at by the proud dames who sat above her, but secretly envied by those who affected to deride them.

"By the bald scalp of Abraham," said Prince John, under Jewess must be the very model of that perfection those charms drove frantic the wisest king that ever lived! What sayest thou, Prior Aymer? By the Temple of that

1 Barre. A loose robe.
2 Agraffe. A clasp.
wise king, which our wiser brother Richard proved unable to recover, she is the very Bride of the Canticles!"\(^1\)

"The Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley," answered the Prior, in a sort of snuffling tone; "but your Grace must remember she is still but a Jewess."

"Ay!" added Prince John, without heeding him, "and there is my Mammon of unrighteousness too—the Marquis of Marks, the Baron of Byzants,\(^3\) contesting for place with penniless dogs, whose threadbare cloaks have not a single cross in their pouches to keep the devil from dancing there. By the body of St. Mark, my prince of supplies, with his lovely Jewess, shall have a place in the gallery! What is she, Isaac? Thy wife or thy daughter, that Eastern houri that thou lockest under thy arm as thou wouldst thy treasure-casket?"

"My daughter Rebecca, so please your Grace," answered Isaac, with a low congee,\(^4\) nothing embarrassed by the Prince’s salutation, in which, however, there was at least as much mockery as courtesy.

"The wiser man thou," said John, with a peal of laughter, in which his gay followers obsequiously joined. "But, daughter or wife, she should be preferred according to her beauty and thy merits. Who sits above there?" he continued, bending his eye on the gallery. "Saxon churls, lolling at their lazy length! Out upon them! let them sit close, and make room for my prince of usurers and his lovely daughter. I'll make the hinds know they must share the high places of the synagogue with those whom the synagogue properly belongs to."

Those who occupied the gallery, to whom this injurious and unpolite speech was addressed, were the family of Ced-

\(^1\) CANTICLES. "The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's."—The Song of Solomon I. 1.

\(^2\) ROSE OF SHARON, etc. See The Song of Solomon II. 1.

\(^3\) MARKS, etc. See The Song of Solomon II. 1. Byzants. Familiar coins of the time. The latter is sometimes spelt bezants; the name is derived from Byzantium, where these pieces were coined, and whence they were brought first by the Crusaders.

\(^4\) CONGE. A bow.
the Saxon, with that of his ally and kinsman, Athelstane Coningsburgh, a personage who, on account of his descent from the last Saxon monarchs of England, was held in the highest respect by all the Saxon natives of the north of England. But with the blood of this ancient and race many of their infirmities had descended to Athelstane. He was comely in countenance, bulky and strong person, and in the flower of his age; yet inanimate in expression, dull-eyed, heavy-browed, inactive and sluggish all his motions, and so slow in resolution, that the briquet of one of his ancestors was conferred upon him, and he was very generally called Athelstane the Unready. His friends—and he had many who, as well as Cedric, were passionately attached to him—contended that this sluggish temper arose not from want of courage, but from mere want of decision; others alleged that his hereditary vice of imbecility had obscured his faculties, never of a very acute order, and that the passive courage and meek good-nature which remained behind were merely the dregs of a character that might have been deserving of praise, but of which all the valuable parts had flown off in the progress of a long course of brutal debauchery.

It was to this person, such as we have described him, that the Prince addressed his imperious command to make place for Isaac and Rebecca. Athelstane, utterly cowed at an order which the manners and feelings of the times rendered so injuriously insulting, unwilling to obey, but undetermined how to resist, opposed only the vis inertiae to the will of John; and, without stirring or making any motion whatever of obedience, opened his large grey eyes and stared at the Prince with an astonishment which had in it something extremely ludicrous. But the impatient John regarded it in no such light.

"The Saxon porker," he said, "is either asleep or minds not. Prick him with your lance, De Bracy," speaking.

Vis inertiae. Force of inertia; sluggishness.
to a knight who rode near him, the leader of a band of free companions, or condottieri;¹ that is, of mercenaries belonging to no particular nation, but attached for the time to any prince by whom they were paid. There was a murmur even among the attendants of Prince John; but De Bracey, whose profession freed him from all scruples, extended his long lance over the space which separated the gallery from the lists, and would have executed the commands of the Prince before Athelstane the Unready had recovered presence of mind sufficient even to draw back his person from the weapon, had not Cedric, as prompt as his companion was tardy, unsheathed, with the speed of lightning, the short sword which he wore, and at a single blow severed the point of the lance from the handle. The blood rushed into the countenance of Prince John. He swore one of his deepest oaths, and was about to utter some threat corresponding in violence, when he was diverted from his purpose, partly by his own attendants, who gathered around him conjuring him to be patient, partly by a general exclamation of the crowd, uttered in loud applause of the spirited conduct of Cedric. The Prince rolled his eyes in indignation, as if to collect some safe and easy victim; and chancing to encounter the firm glance of the same archer whom we have already noticed, and who seemed to persist in his gesture of applause, in spite of the frowning aspect which the Prince bent upon him, he demanded his reason for clamouring thus.

"I always add my hollo," said the yeoman, "when I see a good shot or a gallant blow."

"Sayst thou?" answered the Prince; "then thou canst hit the white thyself, I'll warrant."

"A woodsman's mark, and at woodsman's distance, I can hit," answered the yeoman.

"And Wat Tyrrel's mark,² at a hundred yards," said a

¹ CONDOTTIERI. An Italian term equivalent to mercenaries: hirelings.
² WAT TYRREL'S MARK. King William Rufus was found dead in a gate of the New Forest, with an arrow in his breast, and was supposed to have shot accidentally or otherwise, by Sir Walter Tyrrel, while hunting.
a behind, but by whom uttered could not be disp-

t. Grizzel,"'t a he added, "we will try his own skill, while, stand up, ye Saxon churls," said the fiery no means, an it please your Grace! It is not fit urged, the Jew began to ascend the steep and atastrophe was prevented by the clown Wamba,

in medieval stories, was the model of patience.
should have proved longer than his appetite could endure abstinence. Finding the abomination of his tribe opposed to his very nose, while the Jester at the same time flourished his wooden sword above his head, the Jew recoiled, missed his footing, and rolled down the steps—an excellent jest to the spectators, who set up a loud laughter, in which Prince John and his attendants heartily joined.

"Deal me the prize, cousin Prince," said Wamba; "I have vanquished my foe in fair fight with sword and shield," he added, brandishing the brawn in one hand and the wooden sword in the other.

"Who and what art thou, noble champion?" said Prince John, still laughing.

"A fool by right of descent," answered the Jester; "I am Wamba, the son of Witless, who was the son of Weatherbrain, who was the son of an alderman."¹

"Make room for the Jew in front of the lower ring," said Prince John, not unwilling, perhaps, to seize an apology to desist from his original purpose; "to place the vanquished beside the victor were false heraldry."

"Knave upon fool were worse," answered the Jester, "and Jew upon bacon worst of all."

"Gramercy! good fellow," cried Prince John, "thou pleasest me. Here, Isaac, lend me a handful of byzants."

As the Jew, stunned by the request, afraid to refuse and unwilling to comply, fumbled in the furred bag which hung by his girdle, and was perhaps endeavouring to ascertain how few coins might pass for a handful, the Prince stooped from his jennet and settled Isaac's doubts by snatching the pouch itself from his side; and flinging to Wamba a couple of the gold pieces which it contained, he pursued his career round the lists, leaving the Jew to the derision of those around him, and himself receiving as much applause from the spectators as if he had done some honest and honourable action.

¹Alderman. In Anglo-Saxon times a chief of clan; afterwards a town magistrate.
CHAPTER VIII

At this the challenger with fierce defy
His trumpet sounds; the challenged makes reply.
With clangour rings the field, resounds the vaulted sky.
Their visors closed, their lances in the rest,
Or at the helmet pointed or the crest,
They vanish from the barrier, speed the race,
And spurring see decrease the middle space.

_Palamon and Arcite._

In the midst of Prince John’s cavalcade, he suddenly opt, and, appealing to the Prior of Jorvaulx, declared the principal business of the day had been forgotten.

“By my halidom,” I said he, “we have neglected, Sir prior, to name the fair Sovereign of Love and of Beauty, y whose white hand the palm is to be distributed. For my part, I am liberal in my ideas, and I care not if I give my vote for the black-eyed Rebecca.”

“Holy Virgin,” answered the Prior, turning up his eyes with horror, “a Jewess! We should deserve to be stoned out of the lists; and I am not yet old enough to be a martyr. Besides, I swear by my patron saint that she is far inferior to the lovely Saxon, Rowena.”

“Saxon or Jew,” answered the Prince—“Saxon or Jew, og or hog, what matters it! I say, name Rebecca, were it only to mortify the Saxon churls.”

A murmur arose even among his own immediate attendants.

“This passes a jest, my lord,” said De Bracy; “no

_Halidom._ Something possessing virtue because of its sanctity, e.g., a dc. on which oaths were sworn; the word thus came to mean one’s sacred mor.
knight here will lay lance in rest if such an insult is attempted."

"It is the mere wantonness of insult," said one of the oldest and most important of Prince John's followers, Waldemar Fitzurse, "and if your Grace attempt it, cannot but prove ruinous to your projects."

"I entertained you, sir," said John, reigning up his palfrey haughtily, "for my follower, but not for my counsellor."

"Those who follow your Grace in the paths which you tread," said Waldemar, but speaking in a low voice, "acquire the right of counsellors; for your interest and safety are not more deeply gaged than their own."

From the tone in which this was spoken, John saw the necessity of acquiescence. "I did but jest," he said; "and you turn upon me like so many adders! Name whom you will, in the fiend's name, and please yourselves."

"Nay, nay," said De Bracy, "let the fair sovereign's throne remain unoccupied until the conqueror shall be named, and then let him choose the lady by whom it shall be filled. It will add another grace to his triumph, and teach fair ladies to prize the love of valiant knights, who can exalt them to such distinction."

"If Brian de Bois-Guilbert gain the prize," said Prior, "I will gage my rosary that I name the Sovereign of Love and Beauty."

"Bois-Guilbert," answered De Bracy, "is a good lance; but there are others around these lists, Sir Prior, who will not fear to encounter him."

"Silence, sirs," said Waldemar, "and let the Prince assume his seat. The knights and spectators are alike impatient, the time advances, and highly fit it is that the sports should commence."

*Prince John, though not yet a monarch, had in Walde-iturse all the inconveniences of a favourite minister, in serving his sovereign, must always do so in his way. The Prince acquiesced, however, although his position was precisely of that kind which is apt to be tried upon trifles, and, assuming his throne, and being crowned by his followers, gave signal to the heralds to hush the laws of the tournament, which were briefly as follows:

First, the five challengers were to undertake all comers. Secondly, any knight proposing to combat might, if he pleased, select a special antagonist from among the challengers, by touching his shield. If he did so with the point of his lance, the trial of skill was made with what was called the arms of courtesy, that is, with lances at extremity a piece of round flat board was fixed, so that danger was encountered, save from the shock of lances and riders. But if the shield was touched with the sharp end of the lance, the combat was understood to be on the principle of 'outrance,' that is, the knights were to fight with sharp swords, as in actual battle.

Thirdly, when the knights present had accomplished vow, by each of them breaking five lances, the Prince declared the victor in the first day's tourney, who should receive as prize a war-horse of exquisite beauty and prowess; and in addition to this reward of victory, it was now declared, he should have the peculiar privilege of naming the Queen of Love and Beauty, by whom his choice should be given on the ensuing day.

Fourthly, it was announced that, on the second day, there should be a general tournament, in which all the knights present, who were desirous to win praise, might take part; and being divided into two bands, of equal numbers, might fight it out manfully until the signal was given by Prince John to cease the combat. The elected champion of Love and Beauty was then to crown the knight of the lance. To the uttermost, to the death.
whom the Prince should adjudge to have borne himself best in this second day, with a coronet composed of thin gold plate, cut into the shape of a laurel crown. On this second day the knightly games ceased. But on that which was to follow, feats of archery, of bull-baiting, and other popular amusements were to be practised, for the more immediate amusement of the populace. In this manner did Prince John endeavour to lay the foundation of a popularity which he was perpetually throwing down by some inconsiderate act of wanton aggression upon the feelings and prejudices of the people.

The lists now presented a most splendid spectacle. The sloping galleries were crowded with all that was noble, great, wealthy, and beautiful in the northern and midland parts of England; and the contrast of the various dresses of these dignified spectators rendered the view as gay as it was rich, while the interior and lower space, filled with the substantial burgesses and yeomen of merry England, formed, in their more plain attire, a dark fringe, or border, around this circle of brilliant embroidery, relieving, and at the same time setting off, its splendour.

The heralds finished their proclamation with their usual cry of "Largesse, largesse, gallant knights!" and gold and silver pieces were showered on them from the galleries, it being a high point of chivalry to exhibit liberality towards those whom the age accounted at once the secretaries and the historians of honour. The bounty of the spectators was acknowledged by the customary shouts of "Love of ladies—Death of champions—Honour to the generous—Glory to the brave!" To which the more humble spectators added their acclamations, and a numerous band of trumpeters the flourish of their martial instruments. When these sounds had ceased, the heralds withdrew from the lists in gay and glittering procession, and none remained within them save the marshals of the field, who, armed cap-à-pie, sat on horseback, motionless as statues.

1 Cap-à-Pie. French de cap a pied, from head to foot.
opposite ends of the lists. Meantime, the inclosed at the northern extremity of the lists, large as it was, completely crowded with knights desirous to prove their skill against the challengers, and, when viewed from the gallery, presented the appearance of a sea of waving colors, intermixed with glistening helmets and tall arches at the extremities of which were, in many cases, small pennons of about a span's breadth, which, trailing in the air as the breeze caught them, joined with the brilliant motion of the feathers to add liveliness to the scene.

Length the barriers were opened, and five knights,
by lot, advanced slowly into the area; a single cham-pering in front, and the other four following in pairs.

The splendidly armed, and by Saxon authority (in the ir Manuscript) records at great length their devices, orders, and the embroidery of their horse trappings.

unnecessary to be particular on these subjects. To lines from a contemporary poet, who has written little—

The knights are dust,
And their good swords are rust,
Their souls are with the saints, we trust.¹

Scutcheons² have long mouldered from the walls of castles. Their castles themselves are but green and shattered ruins: the place that once knew is now disere—they have no more—nay, many a race since theirs has died out and been forgotten in the very land which occupied with all the authority of feudal proprietors and feudal lords. What, then, would it avail the reader

Knights ARE DUST, etc." These lines are part of an unpublished work by Coleridge, whose muse so often tantalizes with fragments which intend to express, and the manner in which she flings them from her hand, yet whose unfinished sketches display more talent than masterpieces of others. [Scott.]

Scutcheons, The front of the shields bearing the knight's heraldic design of arms; from Latin scutum, a shield.
to know their names, or the evanescent symbols of their martial rank?

Now, however, no whit anticipating the oblivion which awaited their names and feats, the champions advanced through the lists, restraining their fiery steeds, and compelling them to move slowly, while, at the same time, they exhibited their paces, together with the grace and dexterity of the riders. As the procession entered the lists, the sound of a wild barbaric music was heard from behind the tents of the challengers, where the performers were concealed. It was of Eastern origin, having been brought from the Holy Land; and the mixture of the cymbals and bells seemed to bid welcome at once, and defiance, to the knights as they advanced. With the eyes of an immense concourse of spectators fixed upon them, the five knights advanced up the platform upon which the tents of the challengers stood, and there separating themselves, each touched slightly, and with the reverse of his lance, the shield of the antagonist to whom he wished to oppose himself. The lower order of spectators in general—nay, many of the higher class, and it is even said several of the ladies—were rather disappointed at the champions choosing the arms of courtesy. For the same sort of persons who, in the present day, applaud most highly the deepest tragedies were then interested in a tournament exactly in proportion to the danger incurred by the champions engaged.

Having intimated their more pacific purpose, the champions retreated to the extremity of the lists, where they remained drawn up in a line; while the challengers, sallying each from his pavilion, mounted their horses, and, headed by Brian de Bois-Guilbert, descended from the platform and opposed themselves individually to the knights who had touched their respective shields.

At the flourish of clarions and trumpets, they started out against each other at full gallop; and such was the superior dexterity or good fortune of the challengers, that those opposed to Bois-Guilbert, Malvoisin, and Front-de-Bœuf rolled on the ground. The antagonist of Grantmesnil, instead of bearing his lance-point fair against the crest\(^1\) or the shield of his enemy, swerved so much from the direct line as to break the weapon athwart the person of his opponent—a circumstance which was accounted more disgraceful than that of being actually unhorsed, because the latter might happen from accident, whereas the former evinced awkwardness and want of management of the weapon and of the horse. The fifth knight alone maintained the honour of his party, and parted fairly with the Knight of St. John, both splintering their lances without advantage on either side.

The shouts of the multitude, together with the acclamations of the heralds and the clangour of the trumpets, announced the triumph of the victors and the defeat of the vanquished. The former retreated to their pavilions, and the latter, gathering themselves up as they could, withdrew from the lists in disgrace and dejection, to agree with their victors concerning the redemption of their arms and their horses, which, according to the laws of the tournament, they had forfeited. The fifth of their number alone tarried in the lists long enough to be greeted by the applauses of the spectators, amongst whom he retreated, to the aggravation, doubtless, of his companions’ mortification.

A second and a third party of knights took the field; and although they had various success, yet, upon the whole, the advantage decidedly remained with the challengers, not one of whom lost his seat or swerved from his charge—misfortunes which befell one or two of their antagonists in each encounter. The spirits, therefore, of those opposed to them seemed to be considerably damped by their continued success. Three knights only appeared on the fourth entry, who, avoiding the shields of Bois-Guilbert and Front-\(^1\)Crest, i.e., of the helmet.
de Bœuf, contented themselves with touching those of the three other knights who had not altogether manifested the same strength and dexterity. This politic selection did not alter the fortune of the field: the challengers were still successful. One of their antagonists was overthrown; and both the others failed in the attaint,1 that is, in striking the helmet and shield of their antagonist firmly and strongly, with the lance held in a direct line, so that the weapon might break unless the champion was overthrown.

After this fourth encounter, there was a considerable pause; nor did it appear that any one was very desirous of renewing the contest. The spectators murmured among themselves; for, among the challengers, Malvoisin and Front-de-Bœuf were unpopular from their characters, and the others, except Grantmesnil, were disliked as strangers and foreigners.

But none shared the general feeling of dissatisfaction so keenly as Cedric the Saxon, who saw, in each advantage gained by the Norman challengers, a repeated triumph over the honour of England. His own education had taught him no skill in the games of chivalry, although, with the arms of his Saxon ancestors, he had manifested himself, on many occasions, a brave and determined soldier. He looked anxiously to Athelstane, who had learned the accomplishments of the age, as if desiring that he should make some personal effort to recover the victory which was passing into the hands of the Templar and his associates. But, though both stout of heart and strong of person, Athelstane had a disposition too inert and unambitious to make the exertions which Cedric seemed to expect from him.

"The day is against England, my lord," said Cedric, in a marked tone; "are you not tempted to take the lance?"

"I shall tilt to-morrow," answered Athelstane, "in the mêlée; it is not worth while for me to arm myself to-day."

1 Attaint. This term of chivalry, transferred to the law, gives the phrase of being attainted of treason. [Scott.]
nings displeased Cedric in this speech. It con-Norman word mêlée (to express the general con-et evinced some indifference to the honour of the ut it was spoken by Athelstane, whom he held in und respect that he would not trust himself to s motives or his foibles. Moreover, he had no ake any remark, for Wamba thrust in his word, “IT was better, though scarce easier, to be the mong a hundred than the best man of two.”
stan took the observation as a serious compli-Cedric, who better understood the Jester’s mean-et at him a severe and menacing look; and lucky Wamba, perhaps, that the time and place pre-receiving, notwithstanding his place and service,le marks of his master’s resentment.
use in the tournament was still uninterrupted,
by the voices of the heralds exclaiming; “Love plintering of lances! stand forth, gallant knights, ot upon your deeds!”
usic also of the challengers breathed from time to t bursts expressive of triumph or defiance, while grudged a holiday which seemed to pass away ly; and old knights and nobles lamented in he decay of martial spirit, spoke of the triumphs nger days, but agreed that the land did not now es of such transcendent beauty as had animated of former times. Prince John began to talk to ants about making ready the banquet, and the f adjudging the prize to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, with a single spear, overthrown two knights and ird.
ighth, as the Saracenic music of the challengers one of those long and high flourishes with which roken the silence of the lists, it was answered by trumpet, which breathed a note of defiance from Tilts or tournaments: from Latin juxta, at close quarters.

the northern extremity. All eyes were turned to see the new champion which these sounds announced, and no sooner were the barriers opened than he paced into the lists. As far as could be judged of a man sheathed in armour, the new adventurer did not greatly exceed the middle size, and seemed to be rather slender than strongly made. His suit of armour was formed of steel, richly inlaid with gold, and the device on his shield was a young oak-tree pulled up by the roots, with the Spanish word Desdichado, signifying Disinherited. He was mounted on a gallant black horse, and as he passed through the lists he gracefully saluted the Prince and the ladies by lowering his lance. The dexterity with which he managed his steed, and something of youthful grace which he displayed in his manner, won him the favour of the multitude, which some of the lower classes expressed by calling out, "Touch Ralph de Vipont's shield—touch the Hospitaller's shield; he has the least sure seat, he is your cheapest bargain."

The champion, moving onward amid these well-meant hints, ascended the platform by the sloping alley which led to it from the lists, and, to the astonishment of all present, riding straight up to the central pavilion, struck with the sharp end of his spear the shield of Brian de Bois-Guilbert until it rang again. All stood astonished at his presumption, but none more than the redoubted Knight whom he had thus defied to mortal combat, and who, little expecting so rude a challenge, was standing carelessly at the door of the pavilion.

"Have you confessed yourself, brother," said the Templar, "and have you heard mass this morning, that you peril your life so frankly?"

"I am fitter to meet death than thou art," answered the Disinherited Knight; for by this name the stranger had recorded himself in the books of the tourney.

"Then take your place in the lists," said Bois-Guilbert, "and look your last upon the sun; for this night thou shalt sleep in paradise."
"Gramercy for thy courtesy," replied the Disinherited Knight, "and to requite it, I advise thee to take a fresh horse and a new lance, for by my honour you will need both."

Having expressed himself thus confidently, he reined his horse backward down the slope which he had ascended, and compelled him in the same manner to move backward through the lists, till he reached the northern extremity, where he remained stationary, in expectation of his antagonist. This feat of horsemanship again attracted the applause of the multitude.

However incensed at his adversary for the precautions which he recommended, Brian de Bois-Guilbert did not neglect his advice; for his honour was too nearly concerned to permit his neglecting any means which might ensure victory over his presumptuous opponent. He changed his horse for a proved and fresh one of great strength and spirit. He chose a new and tough spear, lest the wood of the former might have been strained in the previous encounters he had sustained. Lastly, he laid aside his shield, which had received some little damage, and received another from his squires. His first had only borne the general device of his rider, representing two knights riding upon one horse, an emblem expressive of the original humility and poverty of the Templars, qualities which they had since exchanged for the arrogance and wealth that finally occasioned their suppression. Bois-Guilbert's new shield bore a raven in full flight, holding in its claws a skull, and bearing the motto, Gare le Corbeau.¹

When the two champions stood opposed to each other at the two extremities of the lists, the public expectation was strained to the highest pitch. Few augured the possibility that the encounter could terminate well for the Disinherited Knight; yet his courage and gallantry secured the general good wishes of the spectators.

The trumpets had no sooner given the signal, than the

¹ Gare le Corbeau. Ware the Raven!
champions vanished from their posts with the speed of lightning, and closed in the centre of the lists with the shock of a thunderbolt. The lances burst into shivers up to the very grasp, and it seemed at the moment that both knights had fallen, for the shock had made each horse recoil backwards upon its haunches. The address of the riders recovered their steeds by use of the bridle and spur; and having glared on each other for an instant with eyes which seemed to flash fire through the bars of their visors, each made a demi-volte, and, retiring to the extremity of the lists, received a fresh lance from the attendants.

A loud shout from the spectators, waving of searfs and handkerchiefs, and general acclamations, attested the interest taken by the spectators in this encounter—the most equal, as well as the best performed, which had graced the day. But no sooner had the knights resumed their station than the clamour of applause was hushed into a silence so deep and so dead that it seemed the multitude were afraid even to breathe.

A few minutes' pause having been allowed, that the combatants and their horses might recover breath, Prince John with his truncheon signed to the trumpets to sound the onset. The champions a second time sprung from their stations, and closed in the centre of the lists, with the same speed, the same dexterity, the same violence, but not the same equal fortune as before.

In this second encounter, the Templar aimed at the centre of his antagonist's shield, and struck it so fair and forcibly that his spear went to shivers, and the Disinherited Knight reeled in his saddle. On the other hand, that champion had, in the beginning of his career, directed the point of his lance towards Bois-Guilbert's shield, but, changing his aim almost in the moment of encounter, he addressed it to the helmet, a mark more difficult to hit, but which, if attained, rendered the shock more irresistible.

Fair and true he hit the Norman on the visor, where his point kept hold of the bars. Yet, even at this disagree, the Templar sustained his high reputation; and the girths of his saddle burst, he might not have horsecd. As it chanced, however, saddle, horse, and and on the ground under a cloud of dust.
extricate himself from the stirrups and fallen steed
the Templar scarce the work of a moment; and,
with madness, both at his disgrace and at the acclaim-which it was hailed by the spectators, he drew and waved it in defiance of his conqueror. The Enchanted Knight sprung from his steed, and also und his sword. The marshals of the field, however, their horses between them, and reminded them
the laws of the tournament did not, on the present permit this species of encounter.
shall meet again, I trust,” said the Templar, castsentful glance at his antagonist; “and where there separate us.”
we do not,” said the Disinherited Knight, “the all not be mine. On foot or horseback, with spear, or with sword, I am alike ready to encounter thee.”
and angrier words would have been exchanged, marshals, crossing their lances betwixt them, comhem to separate. The Disinherited Knight re-to his first station, and Bois-Guilbert to his tent, remained for the rest of the day in an agony of without alighting from his horse, the conqueror called awl of wine, and opening the beaver, or lower part elmet, announced that he quaffed it, “To all true hearts, and to the confusion of foreign tyrants.” commanded his trumpet to sound a defiance to engers, and desired a herald to announce to them should make no election, but was willing to en-them in the order in which they pleased to advance him.
The gigantic Front-de-Bœuf, armed in sable armour, was the first who took the field. He bore on a white shield a black bull’s head, half defaced by the numerous encounters which he had undergone, and bearing the arrogant motto, Cave, Adsum.¹ Over this champion the Disinherited Knight obtained a slight but decisive advantage. Both knights broke their lances fairly, but Front-de-Bœuf, who lost a stirrup in the encounter, was adjudged to have the disadvantage.

In the stranger’s third encounter with Sir Philip Malvoisin he was equally successful; striking that baron so forcibly on the casque² that the laces of the helmet broke, and Malvoisin, only saved from falling by being unhelmeted, was declared vanquished like his companions.

In his fourth combat with De Grantmesnil the Disinherited Knight showed as much courtesy as he had hitherto evinced courage and dexterity. De Grantmesnil’s horse, which was young and violent, reared and plunged in the course of the career so as to disturb the rider’s aim, and the stranger, declining to take the advantage which this accident afforded him, raised his lance, and passing his antagonist without touching him, wheeled his horse and rode back again to his own end of the lists, offering his antagonist, by a herald, the chance of a second encounter. This De Grantmesnil declined, avowing himself vanquished as much by the courtesy as by the address of his opponent.

Ralph de Vipont summed up the list of the stranger’s triumphs, being hurled to the ground with such force that the blood gushed from his nose and his mouth, and he was borne senseless from the lists.

The acclamations of thousands applauded the unanimous award of the Prince and marshals, announcing that day’s honours to the Disinherited Knight.

¹ Cave, Adsum. Look out, I am here!
² Casque. Helmet.
CHAPTER IX

In the midst was seen
A lady of a more majestic mien,
By stature and by beauty mark'd their sovereign Queen.

And as in beauty she surpass'd the choir,
So nobler than the rest was her attire;
A crown of ruddy gold inclosed her brow,
Plain without pomp, and rich without a show;
A branch of Agnus Castus in her hand,
She bore aloft her symbol of command.

The Flower and the Leaf.

William de Wyvil and Stephen de Martival, the marshals of the field, were the first to offer their congratulations to the victor, praying him, at the same time, to suffer his helmet to be unlaced, or, at least, that he would raise his visor ere they conducted him to receive the prize of the day's tourney from the hands of Prince John. The disinherited Knight, with all knightly courtesy, declined their request, alleging, that he could not at this time suffer his face to be seen, for reasons which he had assigned to the heralds when he entered the lists. The marshals were perfectly satisfied by this reply; for amidst the frequent and precious vows by which knights were accustomed to bind themselves in the days of chivalry, there were none more common than those by which they engaged to remain incognito for a certain space, or until some particular adventure was achieved. The marshals, therefore, pressed no farther into the mystery of the Disinherited Knight, but, announcing to Prince John the conqueror's desire to remain unknown, they requested permission to bring him before the Grace, in order that he might receive the reward of his

149
John's curiosity was excited by the mystery observed by the stranger; and, being already displeased with the issue of the tournament, in which the challengers whom he had favoured had been successively defeated by one knight, he answered haughtily to the marshals, "By the light of Our Lady's brow, this same knight hath been disinherited as well of his courtesy as of his lands, since he desires to appear before us without uncovering his face. Wot ye, my lords," he said, turning round to his train, "who this gallant can be that bears himself thus proudly?"

"I cannot guess," answered De Bracy, "nor did I think there had been within the four seas that girth Britain a champion that could bear down these five knights in one day's jousting. By my faith, I shall never forget the force with which he shocked De Vipont. The poor Hospitaller was hurled from his saddle like a stone from a sling."

"Boast not of that," said a Knight of St. John who was present; "your Temple champion had no better luck. I saw your brave lance, Bois-Guilbert, roll thrice over, grasping his hands full of sand at every turn."

De Bracy, being attached to the Templars, would have replied, but was prevented by Prince John. "Silence, sir!" he said; "what unprofitable debate have we here?"

"The victor," said De Wyvil, "still waits the pleasure of your Highness."

"It is our pleasure," answered John, "that he do so wait until we learn whether there is not some one who can at least guess at his name and quality. Should he remain there till nightfall, he has had work enough to keep him warm."

"Your Grace," said Waldemar Fitzurse, "will do less than due honour to the victor if you compel him to wait till we tell your Highness that which we cannot know; at least I can form no guess—unless he be one of the good

\[\text{\textsuperscript{2}}\text{ Wot: Know; from the Anglo-Saxon verb witan, to know. Compare the phrases I wot, wist ye not? to wit, etc.}\]
ances who accompanied King Richard to Palestine, and are now straggling homeward from the Holy Land."

"It may be the Earl of Salisbury," said De Bracy; "he about the same pitch."

"Sir Thomas de Multon, the Knight of Gilsland, father," said Fitzurse; "Salisbury is bigger in the bones." A whisper arose among the train, but by whom first suggested could not be ascertained. "It might be the King—might be Richard Cœur-de-Lion himself!"

"Over God's forbode!"2 said Prince John, involuntarily turning at the same time as pale as death, and shrinking as if blighted by a flash of lightning; "Waldemar! De Bracy! brave knights and gentlemen, remember your promises, and stand truly by me!"

"Here is no danger impending," said Waldemar Fitzurse; "are you so little acquainted with the gigantic limbs of your father's son, as to think they can be held within the circumference of yonder suit of armour? De Wyvil and Martival, you will best serve the Prince by bringing forward the victor to the throne, and ending an error that has conjured all the blood from his cheeks. Look at him more closely," he continued; "your Highness will see that he wants three inches of King Richard's height, and twice as much of his shoulder breadth. The very horse he backs could not have carried the ponderous weight of King Richard through a single course."

While he was yet speaking, the marshals brought forward the Disinherited Knight to the foot of a wooden flight of steps, which formed the ascent from the lists to Prince John's throne. Still discomposed with the idea that his brother, so much injured, and to whom he was so much indebted, had suddenly arrived in his native kingdom, even the distinctions pointed out by Fitzurse did not altogether remove the Prince's apprehensions; and while,

1 Pitch. Height, stature.
2 Over God's forbode. God forbid!
with a short and embarrassed eulogy upon his valour, he caused to be delivered to him the warhorse assigned as the prize, he trembled lest from the barred visor of the mailed form before him an answer might be returned in the deep and awful accents of Richard the Lion-hearted.

But the Disinherited Knight spoke not a word in reply to the compliment of the Prince, which he only acknowledged with a profound obeisance.

The horse was led into the lists by two grooms richly dressed, the animal itself being fully accoutred with the richest war-furniture; which, however, scarcely added to the value of the noble creature in the eyes of those who were judges. Laying one hand upon the pommel of the saddle, the Disinherited Knight vaulted at once upon the back of the steed without making use of the stirrup, and, brandishing aloft his lance, rode twice around the lists, exhibiting the points and paces of the horse with the skill of a perfect horseman.

The appearance of vanity which might otherwise have been attributed to this display was removed by the propriety shown in exhibiting to the best advantage the princely reward with which he had been just honoured, and the Knight was again greeted by the acclamations of all present.

In the meanwhile, the bustling Prior of Jorvaulx had reminded Prince John, in a whisper, that the victor must now display his good judgment, instead of his valour, by selecting from among the beauties who graced the galleries a lady who should fill the throne of the Queen of Beauty and of Love, and deliver the prize of the tourney, upon the ensuing day. The Prince accordingly made a sign with his truncheon as the Knight passed him in his second career around the lists. The Knight turned towards the throne, and, sinking his lance until the point was within a foot of the ground, remained motionless, as if expecting John's commands; while all admired the sudden dexterity with which he instantly reduced his fiery steed from a state of intense emotion and high excitation to the stillness of an equestrian statue.

"Sir Disinherited Knight," said Prince John, "since this is the only title by which we can address you, it is now our duty, as well as privilege, to name the fair lady who, Queen of Honour and of Love, is to preside over next year's festival. If, as a stranger in our land, you should require the aid of other judgment to guide your own, we only say that Alicia, the daughter of our gallant knight Waldemar Fitzurse, has at our court been long held the first in beauty as in place. Nevertheless, it is your unreserved prerogative to confer on whom you please this honor, by the delivery of which to the lady of your choice the election of to-morrow's Queen will be formal and complete. Raise your lance."

The Knight obeyed; and Prince John placed upon his hand a coronet of green satin, having around its edge a violet of gold, the upper edge of which was relieved by row-points and hearts placed interchangeably, like the strawberry leaves and balls upon a ducal crown.

In the broad hint which he dropped respecting the daughter of Waldemar Fitzurse, John had more than one motive, each the offspring of a mind which was a strange mixture of carelessness and presumption with low artifice and cunning. He wished to banish from the minds of the rivalry around him his own indecent and unacceptable respecting the Jewess Rebecca; he was desirous of conciliating Alicia's father, Waldemar, of whom he stood in awe, and who had more than once shown himself dissatisfied during the course of the day's proceedings. He had no wish to establish himself in the good graces of the lady; for John was at least as licentious in his pleasures as oblige in his ambition. But besides all these reasons, he was desirous to raise up against the Disinherited Knight, wards whom he already entertained a strong dislike, a powerful enemy in the person of Waldemar Fitzurse, who was likely, he thought, highly to resent the injury done to his daughter in case, as was not unlikely, the victor should make another choice.

And so indeed it proved. For the Disinherited Knight passed the gallery, close to that of the Prince, in which the Lady Alicia was seated in the full pride of triumphant beauty, and pacing forwards as slowly as he had hitherto rode swiftly around the lists, he seemed to exercise his right of examining the numerous fair faces which adorned that splendid circle.

It was worth while to see the different conduct of the beauties who underwent this examination, during the time it was proceeding. Some blushed; some assumed an air of pride and dignity; some looked straight forward, and essayed to seem utterly unconscious of what was going on; some drew back in alarm, which was perhaps affected; some endeavoured to forbear smiling; and there were two or three who laughed outright. There were also some who dropped their veils over their charms; but as the Wardour Manuscript says these were fair ones of ten years’ standing, it may be supposed that, having had their full share of such vanities, they were willing to withdraw their claim in order to give a fair chance to the rising beauties of the age.

At length the champion paused beneath the balcony in which the Lady Rowena was placed, and the expectation of the spectators was excited to the utmost.

It must be owned that, if an interest displayed in his success could have bribed the Disinherited Knight, the part of the lists before which he paused had merited his predilection. Cedric the Saxon, overjoyed at the discomfiture of the Templar, and still more so at the miscarriage of his two malevolent neighbours, Front-de-Bœuf and Malvoisin, had, with his body half stretched over the balcony, accompanied the victor in each course not with his eyes only, but with his whole heart and soul. The Lady Rowena watched the progress of the day with equal attention, ough without openly betraying the same intense interest.
the unmoved Athelstane had shown symptoms of killing off his apathy, when, calling for a huge goblet of pascadine,\(^1\) he quaffed it to the health of the Disinherited right.

Another group, stationed under the gallery occupied the Saxons, had shown no less interest in the fate of the y.

"Father Abraham!" said Isaac of York, when the first curse was run betwixt the Templar and the Disinherited night, "how fiercely that Gentile rides! Ah, the good horse that was brought all the long way from Barbary, he does no more care of him than if he were a wild ass's colt; and the noble armour that was worth so many zecchins\(^2\) to Joseph Pareira, the armourer of Milan, besides seventy in the hundred\(^3\) of profits, he cares for it as little as if he had found it in the highways!"

"If he risks his own person and limbs, father," said Rebecca, "in doing such a dreadful battle, he can scarce be expected to spare his horse and armour."

"Child!" replied Isaac, somewhat heated, "thou know-est not what thou speakest. His neck and limbs are his own; but his horse and armour belong to—— Holy Jacob!
what was I about to say? Nevertheless, it is a good youth.
See, Rebecca!—see, he is again about to go up to battle against the Philistine! Pray, child—pray for the safety of the good youth; and of the speedy horse and the rich arbour. God of my fathers!" he again exclaimed, "he hath conquered, and the uncircumcised Philistine hath fallen before his lance, even as Og the King of Bashan,\(^4\) and Sihon, King of the Amorites,\(^5\) fell before the sword of our

\(^1\) MUSCADINE. Wine made from muscat grapes.

\(^2\) ZECCHINS. Sequins; Venetian coins worth about two dollars.

\(^3\) SEVENTY IN THE HUNDRED. Seventy per cent. Isaac estimates the value of Hiram, as the cost plus the profit.

\(^4\) OG THE KING OF BASHAN. See Deuteronomy 3.1-13.

\(^5\) SIHON, ETC. See Numbers XXI. 21-34.
fathers! Surely he shall take their gold and their silver, and their war-horses, and their armour of brass and of steel, for a prey and for a spoil.”

The same anxiety did the worthy Jew display during every course that was run, seldom failing to hazard a hasty calculation concerning the value of the horse and armour which were forfeited to the champion upon each new success. There had been therefore no small interest taken in the success of the Disinherited Knight by those who occupied the part of the lists before which he now paused.

Whether from indecision or some other motive of hesitation, the champion of the day remained stationary for more than a minute, while the eyes of the silent audience were riveted upon his motions; and then, gradually and gracefully sinking the point of his lance, he deposited the coronet which it supported at the feet of the fair Rowena. The trumpets instantly sounded, while the heralds proclaimed the Lady Rowena the Queen of Beauty and of Love for the ensuing day, menacing with suitable penalties those who should be disobedient to her authority. They then repeated their cry of “Largesse,” to which Cedric, in the height of his joy, replied by an ample donative,\(^1\) and to which Athelstane, though less promptly, added one equally large.

There was some murmuring among the damsels of Norman descent, who were as much unused to see the preference given to a Saxon beauty as the Norman nobles were to sustain defeat in the games of chivalry which they themselves had introduced. But these sounds of disaffection were drowned by the popular shout of “Long live the Lady Rowena, the chosen and lawful Queen of Love and of Beauty!” To which many in the lower area added, “Long live the Saxon Princess! long live the race of the immortal Alfred!”

However unacceptable these sounds might be to Prince in and to those around him, he saw himself nevertheless aged to confirm the nomination of the victor, and acdlingly calling to horse, he left his throne, and mount-his jennet, accompanied by his train, he again entered lists. The Prince paused a moment beneath the gall of the Lady Alicia, to whom he paid his compliments, serving, at the same time, to those around him: “By my side, sirs! if the Knight’s feats in arms have shown the hath limbs and sinews, his choice hath no less ved that his eyes are none of the clearest.”
It was on this occasion, as during his whole life, John’s fortune not perfectly to understand the characters of se whom he wished to conciliate. Waldemar Fitzurse rather offended than pleased at the Prince stating thus al an opinion that his daughter had been slighted.
“I know no right of chivalry,” he said, “more precious alienable than that of each free knight to choose his love by his own judgment. My daughter courts disction from no one; and in her own character, and in her phere, will never fail to receive the full proportion that which is her due.”
Prince John replied not; but, spurring his horse, as if tive vent to his vexation, he made the animal bound ford to the gallery where Rowena was seated, with the still at her feet.
“Assume,” he said, “fair lady, the mark of your sovgnty, to which none vows homage more sincerely than self, John of Anjou; and if it please you to-day, with oble sire and friends, to grace our banquet in the	le of Ashby, we shall learn to know the empress to se service we devote to-morrow.”
Rowena remained silent, and Cedric answered for her his native Saxon.
“The Lady Rowena,” he said, “possesses not the lange in which to reply to your courtesy, or to sustain her in your festival. I also, and the noble Athelstane of Coningsburgh, speak only the language, and practise only the manners, of our fathers. We therefore decline with thanks your Highness's courteous invitation to the banquet. To-morrow, the Lady Rowena will take upon her the state to which she has been called by the free election of the victor Knight, confirmed by the acclamations of the people."

So saying, he lifted the coronet and placed it upon Rowena's head, in token of her acceptance of the temporary authority assigned to her.

"What says he?" said Prince John, affecting not to understand the Saxon language, in which, however, he was well skilled. The purport of Cedric's speech was repeated to him in French. "It is well," he said; "to-morrow we will ourselves conduct this mute sovereign to her seat of dignity.
You, at least, Sir Knight," he added, turning to the victor who had remained near the gallery, "will this day share our banquet?"

The Knight, speaking for the first time, in a low and hurried voice, excused himself by pleading fatigue, and the necessity of preparing for to-morrow's encounter.

"It is well," said Prince John, haughtily; "although unused to such refusals, we will endeavor to digest our ban-queta as we may, though ungraced by the most successful in arms and his elected Queen of Beauty."

So saying, he prepared to leave the lists with his glittering train, and his turning his steed for that purpose was the signal for the breaking up and dispersion of the spectators.

Yet, with the vindictive memory proper to offended pride, especially when combined with conscious want of desert, John had hardly proceeded three paces ere again, turning around, he fixed an eye of stern resentment upon the yeoman who had displeased him in the early part of the day, and issued his commands to the men-at-arms who stood near: "On your life, suffer not that fellow to escape."
Yeoman stood the angry glance of the Prince with unvaried steadiness which had marked his former look, saying, with a smile: "I have no intention to yield until the day after to-morrow. I must see how Shire and Leicestershire can draw their bows; the Needwood and Charnwood must rear good arch-said Prince John to his attendants, but not in reply—"I will see how he can draw his own; and if he can, let him unless his skill should prove some apology for our insolence!"
full time," said De Bracy, "that the outrecedance of the peasants should be restrained by some striking example. Fitzurse, who probably thought his patron was taking the readiest road to popularity, shrugged his shoulders and was silent. Prince John resumed his seat among the lists, and the dispersion of the multitude was general.
various routes, according to the different quarters from which they came, and in groups of various numbers, the victors were seen retiring over the plain. By far the numerosest part streamed towards the town of Ash. Among many of the distinguished persons were lodged at the castle, and where others found accommodation in the town. Among these were most of the knights who had appeared in the tournament, or who proposed to ride there the ensuing day, and who, as they rode slowly walking over the events of the day, were greeted with shouts by the populace. The same acclamations were raised upon Prince John, although he was indebted for much of the splendour of his appearance and train of the popularity of his character.
more sincere and more general, as well as a betteracclamation, attended the victor of the day, until, vindictive. Presumption, insolence. [Scott.]

anxious to withdraw himself from popular notice, he accepted the accommodation of one of those pavilions pitched at the extremities of the lists, the use of which was gratuitously tendered him by the marshals of the field. On retiring to his tent, many who had lingered in the crowd to look upon and form conjectures concerning him, dispersed.

The signs and sounds of a tumultuous concourse of men, lately crowded together in one place, and agitated by the same passing events, were now exchanged for the subdued hum of voices of different groups retreating in all directions, and these speedily died away in silence. No distinct sounds were heard save the voices of the menials, stripped the galleries of their cushions and tapestry as they went in order to put them in safety for the night, and wrangled among themselves for the half-used bottles of wine, relics of the refreshment which had been served round among the spectators.

Beyond the precincts of the lists more than one tent was erected; and these now began to glimmer through the twilight, announcing the toil of the armourers, which was to continue through the whole night, in order to repair and alter the suits of armour to be used again on the morrow.

A strong guard of men-at-arms, renewed at intervals from two hours to two hours, surrounded the lists, and kept watch during the night.
CHAPTER X

Thus, like the sad presaging raven, that toils
The sick man’s passport in her hollow beak,
And in the shadow of the silent night
Doth shake contagion from her sable wings;
Vex’d and tormented, runs poor Barrabas,
With fatal curses towards these Christians.

_Jew of Malta._

The Disinherited Knight had no sooner reached his pavilion than squires and pages in abundance tendered their services to disarm him, to bring fresh attire, and to offer him the refreshment of the bath. Their zeal on this occasion was perhaps sharpened by curiosity, since everyone desired to know who the knight was that had gained so many laurels, yet had refused, even at the command of Prince John, to lift his visor or to name his name. But their officious inquisitiveness was not gratified. The Disinherited Knight refused all other assistance save that of his own squire, or rather yeoman—a clownish-looking man, who, wrapt in a cloak of dark-coloured felt, and having his head and face half-buried in a Norman bonnet made of black fur, seemed to affect the incognito1 as much as his master. All others being excluded from the tent, this attendant relieved his master from the more burdensome parts of his armour, and placed food and wine before him, which the exertions of the day rendered very acceptable.

The Knight had scarcely finished a hasty meal ere his menial announced to him that five men, each leading a barbed2 steed, desired to speak with him. The Disinherited

1 _Incognito_. Disguised; from Latin _incognito_, unknown.
2 _Barbed_. Protected with armor.
Knight had exchanged his armour for the long robe usually worn by those of his condition, which, being furnished with a hood, concealed the features, when such was the pleasure of the wearer, almost as completely as the visor of the helmet itself; but the twilight, which was now fast darkening, would of itself have rendered a disguise unnecessary, unless to persons to whom the face of an individual chanced to be particularly well known.

The Disinherited Knight, therefore, stept boldly forth to the front of his tent, and found in attendance the squires of the challengers, whom he easily knew by their russet and black dresses, each of whom led his master’s charger, loaded with the armour in which he had that day fought.

“According to the laws of chivalry,” said the foremost of these men, “I, Baldwin de Oyley, squire to the redoubted Knight Brian de Bois-Guilbert, make offer to you, styling yourself for the present the Disinherited Knight, of the horse and armour used by the said Brian de Bois-Guilbert in this day’s passage of arms, leaving it with your nobleness to retain or to ransom the same, according to your pleasure; for such is the law of arms.”

The other squires repeated nearly the same formula, and then stood to await the decision of the Disinherited Knight.

“To you four, sirs,” replied the Knight, addressing those who had last spoken, “and to your honourable and valiant masters, I have one common reply. Commend me to the noble knights, your masters, and say, I should do ill to deprive them of steeds and arms which can never be used by braver cavaliers. I would I could here end my message to these gallant knights; but being, as I term myself, in truth and earnest the Disinherited, I must be thus far bound to your masters, that they will, of their courtesy, be pleased to ransom their steeds and armour, since that which I wear I can hardly term mine own.”

“We stand commissioned, each of us,” answered the quire of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, "to offer a hundred zecuins in ransom of these horses and suits of armour."

"It is sufficient," said the Disinherited Knight. "Half the sum my present necessities compel me to accept; of the remaining half, distribute one moiety among your-lives, sir squires, and divide the other half betwixt the raids and the pursuivants, and minstrels, and attendants."

The squires, with cap in hand, and low reverences, expressed their deep sense of a courtesy and generosity not ten practised, at least upon a scale so extensive. The Disinherited Knight then addressed his discourse to Baldin, the squire of Brian de Bois-Guilbert. "From your master," said he, "I will accept neither arms nor ransom.
Say to him in my name, that our strife is not ended—no, not till we have fought as well with swords as with lances, not well on foot as on horseback. To this mortal quarrel he has himself defied me, and I shall not forget the challenge. Meantime, let him be assured that I hold him not one of his companions, with whom I can with pleasure exchage courtesies; but rather as one with whom I stand upon terms of mortal defiance."

"My master," answered Baldwin, "knows how to re-quite scorn with scorn, and blows with blows, as well as courtesy with courtesy. Since you disdain to accept from him any share of the ransom at which you have rated the arms of the other knights, I must leave his armour and his horse here, being well assured that he will never deign to count the one nor wear the other."

"You have spoken well, good squire," said the Disin-herited Knight—"well and boldly, as it beseemeth him to speak who answers for an absent master. Leave not, however, the horse and armour here. Restore them to thy master; or, if he scorns to accept them, retain them, good friend, for thine own use. So far as they are mine, I bestow them upon you freely."

Baldwin made a deep obeisance, and retired with his companions; and the Disinherited Knight entered the pavilion.

"Thus far, Gurth," said he, addressing his attendant, "the reputation of English chivalry hath not suffered in my hands."

"And I," said Gurth, "for a Saxon swineherd, have not ill played the personage of a Norman squire-at-arms."

"Yea, but," answered the Disinherited Knight, "thou hast ever kept me in anxiety lest thy clownish bearing should discover thee."

"Tush!" said Gurth, "I fear discovery from none, say ing my playfellow, Wamba the Jester, of whom I could never discover whether he was most knave or fool. Yet I could scarce choose but laugh, when my old master passed so near to me, dreaming all the while that Gurth was keeping his porkers many a mile off, in the thickets and swamps of Rotherwood. If I am discovered——"

"Enough," said the Disinherited Knight, "thou know est my promise."

"Nay, for that matter," said Gurth, "I will never fail my friend for fear of my skin-cutting. I have a tough hide that will bear knife or scourge as well as any boar's hide in my herd."

"Trust me, I will requite the risk you run for my love, Gurth," said the Knight. "Meanwhile, I pray you to accept these ten pieces of gold."

"I am richer," said Gurth, putting them into his pouch, "than ever was swineherd or bondsman."

"Take this bag of gold to Ashby," continued his master, "and find out Isaac the Jew of York, and let him pay himself for the horse and arms with which his credit supplied me."
“Nay, by St. Dunstan,” replied Gurth, “that I will not do.”

“How, knave,” replied his master, “wilt thou not obey my commands?”

“So they be honest, reasonable, and Christian commands,” replied Gurth; “but this is none of these. To suffer the Jew to pay himself would be dishonest, for it would be cheating my master; and unreasonable, for it were the part of a fool; and unchristian, since it would be plundering a believer to enrich an infidel.”

“See him contented, however, thou stubborn varlet,” said the Disinherited Knight.

“I will do so,” said Gurth, taking the bag under his cloak and leaving the apartment; “and it will go hard,” he muttered, “but I content him with one-half of his own asking.” So saying, he departed, and left the Disinherited Knight to his own perplexed ruminations, which, upon more accounts than it is now possible to communicate to the reader, were of a nature peculiarly agitating and painful.

We must now change the scene to the village of Ashby, or rather to a country house in its vicinity belonging to a wealthy Israelite, with whom Isaac, his daughter, and retinue had taken up their quarters; the Jews, it is well known, being as liberal in exercising the duties of hospitality and charity among their own people as they were alleged to be reluctant and churlish in extending them to those whom they termed Gentiles, and whose treatment of them certainly merited little hospitality at their hand.

In an apartment, small indeed, but richly furnished with decorations of an Oriental taste, Rebecca was seated on a heap of embroidered cushions, which, piled along a low platform that surrounded the chamber, served, like the estrada\(^1\) of the Spaniards, instead of chairs and stools. She was watching the motions of her father with a look of anxious and filial affection, while he paced the apartment with a dejected mien and disordered step, sometimes clasping his hands together, sometimes casting his eyes to the roof of the apartment, as one who laboured under great mental tribulation. “O Jacob!” he exclaimed—“O all ye twelve Holy Fathers of our tribe! what a losing ventucre is this for one who hath duly kept every jot and tittle of the law of Moses! Fifty zecchins wrenched from me at one clutch, and by the talons of a tyrant!”

1 Varlet. Originally a boy or page; here used for servant, and with contemptuous force.

“But, father,” said Rebecca, “you seemed to give the gold to Prince John willingly.”

“Willingly! the blotch\(^2\) of Egypt upon him! Willingly, saidst thou? Ay, as willingly as when, in the Gulf of Lyons, I flung over my merchandise to lighten the ship, while she laboured in the tempest—robed the seething billows in my choice silks—perfumed their briny foam with myrrh and aloes—enriched their caverns with gold and silver work! And was not that an hour of unutterable misery, though my hands made the sacrifice?”

“But it was a sacrifice which Heaven exacted to save our lives,” answered Rebecca, “and the God of our fathers has since blessed your store and your gettings.”

“Ay,” answered Isaac, “but if the tyrant lays hold on them as he did to-day, and compels me to smile while he is robbing me? O daughter, disinherited and wandering as we are, the worst evil which befalls our race is, that when we are wronged and plundered all the world laughs around, and we are compelled to suppress our sense of injury, and to smile tamely when we would revenge bravely.”

“Think not thus of it, my father,” said Rebecca; “we also have advantages. These Gentiles, cruel and oppressive

---

\(^1\) Estrada. A low bench running round the room.

\(^2\) Blotch. An eruption on the skin; a plague.

Note the unconscious poetry in Isaac’s words.
as they are, are in some sort dependent on the dispersed children of Zion, whom they despise and persecute. Without the aid of our wealth they could neither furnish forth their hosts in war nor their triumphs in peace; and the gold which we lend them returns with increase to our coffers. We are like the herb which flourisheth most when it is most trampled on. Even this day's pageant had not proceeded without the consent of the despised Jew, who furnished the means."

"Daughter," said Isaac, "thou hast harped upon another string of sorrow. The goodly steed and the rich armour, equal to the full profit of my adventure with our Kirjath Jairam of Leicester—there is a dead loss too—ay, a loss which swallows up the gains of a week—ay, of the space between two Sabaoths— and yet it may end better than I now think, for 'tis a good youth."

"Assuredly," said Rebecca, "you shall not repent you of requiting the good deed received of the stranger knight."

"I trust so, daughter," said Isaac, "and I trust too in the rebuilding of Zion; but as well do I hope with my own bodily eyes to see the walls and battlements of the new Temple, as to see a Christian, yea, the very best of Christians, repay a debt to a Jew, unless under the awe of the judge and jailer."

So saying, he resumed his discontented walk through the apartment; and Rebecca, perceiving that her attempts at consolation only served to awaken new subjects of complaint, wisely desisted from her unavailing efforts—a prudent line of conduct, and we recommend to all who set up for comforters and advisers to follow it in the like circumstances.

The evening was now becoming dark, when a Jewish servant entered the apartment and placed upon the table two silver lamps, fed with perfumed oil; the richest wines

---

*Sabaoths. The word Sabaoth means hosts, (compare the phrase, "Lord God of Sabaoth," which is here confused, as frequently, with Sabbath."
and the most delicate refreshments were at the same time displayed by another Israelitish domestic on a small ebony table, inlaid with silver; for, in the interior of their houses, the Jews refused themselves no expensive indulgences. At the same time the servant informed Isaac that a Nazarene (so they termed Christians while conversing among themselves) desired to speak with him. He that would live by traffic must hold himself at the disposal of every one claiming business with him. Isaac at once replaced on the table the untasted glass of Greek wine which he had just raised to his lips, and saying hastily to his daughter, “Rebecca, veil thyself,” commanded the stranger to be admitted.

Just as Rebecca had dropped over her fine features a screen of silver gauze which reached to her feet, the door opened, and Gurth entered, wrapt in the ample folds of his Norman mantle. His appearance was rather suspicious than prepossessing, especially as, instead of doffing his bonnet, he pulled it still deeper over his rugged brow.

“Art thou Isaac the Jew of York?” said Gurth, in Saxon.

“I am,” replied Isaac, in the same language, for his traffic had rendered every tongue spoken in Britain familiar to him, “and who art thou?”

“That is not to the purpose,” answered Gurth.

“As much as my name is to thee,” replied Isaac; “for without knowing thine, how can I hold intercourse with thee?”

“Easily,” answered Gurth; “I, being to pay money, must know that I deliver it to the right person; thou, who art to receive it, wilt not, I think, care very greatly by whose hands it is delivered.”

“Oh,” said the Jew, “you are come to pay monies? Holy Father Abraham! that altereth our relation to each other. And from whom dost thou bring it?”

“From the Disinherited Knight,” said Gurth, “victor in this day’s tournament. It is the price of the armour sup-ed to him by Kirjath Jairam of Leicester, on thy recommendation. The steed is restored to thy stable. I desire I know the amount of the sum which I am to pay for the nour."

"I said he was a good youth!" exclaimed Isaac, with ful exultation. "A cup of wine will do thee no harm," added, filling and handing to the swineherd a richer aught than Gurth had ever before tasted. "And how much money," continued Isaac, "hast thou brought with thee?"

"Holy Virgin!" said Gurth, setting down the cup, "what star these unbelieving dogs drink, while true Christians a fain to quaff ale as muddy and thick as the draff we give to hogs! What money have I brought with me?" convinced the Saxon, when he had finished this uncivil ejaculation, "even but a small sum; something in hand the whilest. What, Isaac! thou must bear a conscience, though be a Jewish one."

"Nay, but," said Isaac, "thy master has won goodly seeds and rich armours with the strength of his lance and his right hand—but 'tis a good youth; the Jew will take these in present payment, and render him back the surplus."

"My master has disposed of them already," said Gurth. "Ah! that was wrong," said the Jew—"that was the part for a fool. No Christian here could buy so many horses and no Jews except myself would give him half the horses. But thou hast a hundred zeehins with thee in a bag," said Isaac, prying under Gurth's cloak, "it is a heavy one."

"I have heads for cross-bow bolts in it," said Gurth, delighted.

"Well, then," said Isaac, panting and hesitating between habitual love of gain and a new-born desire to be liberal in the present instance, "if I should say that I would take eighty zecchins for the good steed and the rich armour, which leaves me not a guilder's profit, have you money to pay me?"

"Barely," said Gurth, though the sum demanded was more reasonable than he expected, "and it will leave my master nigh penniless. Nevertheless, if such be your least offer, I must be content."

"Fill thyself another goblet of wine," said the Jew. "Ah! eighty zecchins is too little. It leaveth no profit for the usages of the monies; and, besides, the good horse may have suffered wrong in this day's encounter. Oh, it was a hard and a dangerous meeting! man and steed rushing on each other like wild bulls of Bashan! the horse cannot but have had wrong."

"And I say," replied Gurth, "he is sound, wind and limb; and you may see him now in your stable. And I say, over and above, that seventy zecchins is enough for the armour, and I hope a Christian's word is as good as a Jew's. If you will not take seventy, I will carry this bag (and be shook it till the contents jingled) back to my master."

"Nay, nay!" said Isaac; "lay down the talents—the shekels—the eighty zecchins; and thou shalt see I will consider thee liberally."

Gurth at length complied; and telling out eighty zecchins upon the table, the Jew delivered out to him an acquaintance for the horse and suit of armour. The Jew's hand trembled for joy as he wrapped up the first seventy pieces of gold. The last ten he told over with much deliberation, pausing, and saying something as he took each piece from the table and dropt it into his purse. It seemed as if his avarice were struggling with his better nature, and compelling him to pouch zecchin after zecchin, while his generosity urged him to restore some part at least to his benefactor, or as a donation to his agent. His whole speech ran nearly thus:

1 Guilder. Guilder: a Dutch coin worth about fifty cents.
2 Bulls of Bashan. See Psalms XXII. 12.
nty-one, seventy-two—thy master is a good seventy-three—an excellent youth—seventy-four piece hath been clipt within the ring—seventy-five at looketh light of weight—seventy-six—when thy wants money, let him come to Isaac of York—sev-that is, with reasonable security.” Here he considerable pause, and Gurth had good hope that three pieces might escape the fate of their com-the enumeration proceeded; “Seventy-eight—a good fellow—seventy-nine—and deservest some-the Jew paused again, and looked at the last zec-ending, doubtless, to bestow it upon Gurth. He it upon the tip of his finger, and made it ring by it upon the table. Had it rung too flat, or had hair’s breadth too light, generosity had carried the unhappily for Gurth, the chime was full and true, in plump, newly coined, and a grain above weight. Id not find in his heart to part with it, so dropt purse as if in absence of mind, with the words, completes the tale,1 and I trust thy master will see handsomely. Surely,” he added, looking earn-he bag, “thou hast more coins in that pouch?” grinned, which was his nearest approach to a he replied, “About the same quantity which thou told over so carefully.” He then folded the quit-put it under his cap, adding, “Peril of thy beard, that this be full and ample!” He filled himself, a third goblet of wine, and left the apartment ceremonial.
becca,” said the Jew, “that Ishmaelite hath gone beyond me. Nevertheless, his master is a good

Count; to tell meant originally to count, and this usage survives horse and by the strength of his lance, which, like that of Goliath the Philistine, might vie with a weaver’s beam.”

As he turned to receive Rebecca’s answer, he observed that during his chaffering with Gurth she had left the apartment unperceived.

In the mean while, Gurth had descended the stair, and,
having reached the dark ante-chamber or hall, was puzzling about to discover the entrance, when a figure in white, shown by a small silver lamp which she held in her hand, beckoned him into a side apartment. Gurth had some reluctance to obey the summons. Rough and impetuous as a wild boar where only earthly force was to be apprehended, he had all the characteristic terrors of a Saxon respecting fauns,\(^1\) forest fiends, white women, and the whole of the superstitions which his ancestors had brought with them from the wilds of Germany. He remembered, moreover, that he was in the house of a Jew, a people who, besides the other unamiable qualities which popular report ascribed to them, were supposed to be profound necromancers and cabalists.\(^2\) Nevertheless, after a moment’s pause, he obeyed the beckoning summons of the apparition, and followed her into the apartment which she indicated, where he found, to his joyful surprise, that his fair guide was the beautiful Jewess whom he had seen at the tournament, and a short time in her father’s apartment.

She asked him the particulars of his transaction with Isaac, which he detailed accurately.

“My father did but jest with thee, good fellow,” said Rebecca; he owes thy master deeper kindness than these arms and steed could pay, were their value tenfold. What sum didst thou pay my father even now?”

---

\(^1\) Fauns, etc. In the superstition of the time, spirits both good and evil peopled the woods and fields, appearing to mortals sometimes to torment, sometimes to warn them of impending calamity. Fauns were represented as men having the legs of a goat. White women. Mysterious ladies clad in white, were seen by some on the eve of disaster.

\(^2\) Cabalists. Those among the Jews who professed to possess a secret science of interpretation, confused by their enemies with knowledge of magic and the practice of witchcraft.
“Eighty zecchins,” said Gurth, surprised at the question.

“In this purse,” said Rebecca, “thou wilt find a hundred. Restore to thy master that which is his due, and enrich thyself with the remainder. Haste—begone—stay not to render thanks! and beware how you pass through this crowded town, where thou mayst easily lose both thy burden and thy life. Reuben,” she added, clapping her hands together, “light forth this stranger, and fail not to draw lock and bar behind him.”

Reuben, a dark-browed and black-bearded Israelite, obeyed her summons, with a torch in his hand; undid the outward door of the house, and conducting Gurth across a paved court, let him out through a wicket in the entrance-gate, which he closed behind him with such bolts and chains as would well have become that of a prison.

“By St. Dunstan,” said Gurth, as he stumbled up the dark avenue, “this is no Jewess, but an angel from heaven! Ten zecchins from my brave young master—twenty from this pearl of Zion! Oh, happy day! Such another, Gurth, will redeem thy bondage, and make thee a brother as free of thy guild\(^1\) as the best. And then do I lay down my swineherd’s horn and staff, and take the freeman’s sword and buckler, and follow my young master to the death, without hiding either my face or my name.”

---

\(^1\) Guild. A society of craftsmen in any trade; an organization of considerable dignity and power. The phrase used means invested with all the Privileges and rights of freedom.
CHAPTER XI

1st Outlaw. Stand, sir, and throw us that you have about you;
If not, we’ll make you sit, and rifle you.
Speed. Sir, we are undone! these are the villains
That all the travellers do fear so much.
Val. My friends—
1st Out. That’s not so, sir, we are your enemies.
2d Out. Peace! we’ll hear him.
3d Out. Ay, by my beard, will we;
For he’s a proper man.

Two Gentlemen of Verona.

The nocturnal adventures of Gurth were not yet concluded; indeed, he himself became partly of that mind when, after passing one or two straggling houses which stood in the outskirts of the village, he found himself in a deep lane, running between two banks overgrown with hazel and holly, while here and there a dwarf oak hung its arms altogether across the path. The lane was, moreover, much rutted and broken up by the carriages which had recently transported articles of various kinds to the tournament; and it was dark, for the banks and bushes intercepted the light of the harvest moon.

From the village were heard the distant sounds of revelry, mixed occasionally with loud laughter, sometimes broken by screams, and sometimes by wild strains of distant music. All these sounds, intimating the disorderly state of the town, crowded with military nobles and their dissolute attendants, gave Gurth some uneasiness. “The Jewess was right,” he said to himself. “By heaven and St. Dunstan, I would I were safe at my journey’s end with all this treasure! Here are such numbers, I will not say of rant thieves, but of errant knights and errant squires, errant monks and errant minstrels, errant jugglers and errant jesters, that a man with a single merk would be in anger, much more a poor swineherd with a whole bagful of zecchins. Would I were out of the shade of these infernal bushes, that I might at least see any of St. Nicholas's clerks before they spring on my shoulders?" Gurth accordingly hastened his pace, in order to gain the open common to which the lane led, but was not so fortunate as to accomplish his object. Just as he attained the upper end of the lane, where the underwood was thickest, four men sprung upon him, even as his fears anticipated, two from each side of the road, and seized him so fast that resistance, if at first practicable, would have been now too late. "Surrender your charge," said one of them: "we are the deliverers of the commonwealth, who ease every man of his burden."

"You should not ease me of mine so lightly," muttered Gurth, whose surly honesty could not be tamed even by the pressure of immediate violence, "had I it but in my power to give three strokes in its defence."

"We shall see that presently," said the robber; and, speaking to his companions, he added, "bring along the nave. I see he would have his head broken as well as his narse cut, and so be let blood in two veins at once."

Gurth was hurried along agreeably to this mandate, and having been dragged somewhat roughly over the bank on the left-hand side of the lane, found himself in a straggling thicket, which lay betwixt it and the open common.

1 Errant. Gurth succeeds very well in turning this pun; errant, wanderer, was commonly used in this sense, as in the phrase knight-errant. While the term errant, infamous, was doubtless sometimes applicable to these wanderers, as here.

2 St. Nicholas's Clerks. Robbers; St. Nicholas was originally the patron saint of Russia, and also was supposed to protect merchants and travellers as well as children. This use of the saint's name seems to have arisen from the custom of praying for his protection against robbers and pirates. Another interpretation of the phrase refers it to a canonization of "Old Nick," an appropriate object of reverence by such gentry. See Shakspere's King Henry V, part 1, D. 1, 67.
He was compelled to follow his rough conductors into the very depth of this covert, where they stopt unexpectedly in an irregular open space, free in a great measure from trees, and on which, therefore, the beams of the moon fell without much interruption from boughs and leaves. Here his captors were joined by two other persons, apparently belonging to the gang. They had short swords by their sides, and quarter-staves in their hands, and Gurth could now observe that all six wore visors, which rendered their occupation a matter of no question, even had their former proceedings left it in doubt.

"What money hast thou, churl?" said one of the thieves.

"Thirty zecchins of my own property," answered Gurth, doggedly.

"A forfeit—a forfeit," shouted the robbers; "a Saxon hath thirty zecchins, and returns sober from a village! An undeniable and unredeemable forfeit of all he hath about him."

"I hoarded it to purchase my freedom," said Gurth.

"Thou art an ass," replied one of the thieves; "three quarts of double ale had rendered thee as free as thy master, ay, and freer too, if he be a Saxon like thyself."

"A sad truth," replied Gurth; "but if these same thirty zecchins will buy my freedom from you, unloose my hands and I will pay them to you."

"Hold," said one who seemed to exercise some authority over the others; "this bag which thou bearest, as I can feel through thy cloak, contains more coin than thou hast told us of."

"It is the good knight my master's," answered Gurth, "of which, assuredly, I would not have spoken a word, had you been satisfied with working your will upon mine own property."

"Thou art an honest fellow," replied the robber, "I warrant thee; and we worship not St. Nicholas so devoutly

1 Double ale. Ale of double strength.
what thy thirty zecchins may yet escape, if thou deal rightly with us. Meantime, render up thy trust for the e.” So saying, he took from Gurth’s breast the large thern pouch, in which the purse given him by Rebecca inclosed, as well as the rest of the zecchins, and then inued his interrogation; “Who is thy master?” “The Disinherited Knight,” said Gurth. “Whose good lance,” replied the robber, “won the prize to-day’s tourney? What is his name and lineage?” “It is his pleasure,” answered Gurth, “that they be con- ed; and from me, assuredly, you will learn nought of u.” “What is thine own name and lineage?” “To tell that,” said Gurth, “might reveal my master’s.” “Thou art a saucy groom,” said the robber; “but of that n. How comes thy master by this gold? is it of his nance, or by what means hath it accrued to him?” “By his good lance,” answered Gurth. “These bags ain the ransom of four good horses and four good suits armour.” “How much is there?” demanded the robber. “Two hundred zecchins.” “Only two hundred zecchins!” said the bandit; “your ter hath dealt liberally by the vanquished, and put a to a cheap ransom. Name those who paid the gold.” Gurth did so. “The armour and horse of the Templar Brian de Bois- bert—at what ransom were they held? Thou seest canst not deceive me.” “My master,” replied Gurth, “will take nought from Templar save his life’s-blood. They are on terms of tal defiance, and cannot hold courteous intercourse to- er.” “Indeed!” repeated the robber, and paused after he had the word. “And what wert thou now doing at Ashby such a charge in thy custody?”
"I went thither to render to Isaac the Jew of York," replied Gurth, "the price of a suit of armour with which he fitted my master for this tournament."

"And how much didst thou pay to Isaac? Methinks, to judge by weight, there is still two hundred zecchins in this pouch."

"I paid to Isaac," said the Saxon, "eighty zecchins, and he restored me a hundred in lieu thereof."

"How! what!" exclaimed all the robbers at once; "darest thou trifle with us, that thou tellest such improbable lies?"

"What I tell you," said Gurth, "is as true as the moon is in heaven. You will find the just sum in a silken purse within the leathern pouch, and separate from the rest of the gold."

"Bethink thee, man," said the Captain, "thou speakest of a Jew—of an Israelite, as unapt to restore gold as the dry sand of his deserts to return the cup of water which the pilgrim spills upon them."

"There is no more mercy in them," said another of the banditti, "than in an unbribed sheriff's officer."

"It is, however, as I say," said Gurth.

"Strike a light instantly," said the Captain; "I will examine this said purse; and if it be as this fellow says, the Jew's bounty is little less miraculous than the stream which relieved his fathers in the wilderness."

A light was procured accordingly, and the robber proceeded to examine the purse. The others crowded around him, and even two who had hold of Gurth relaxed their grasp while they stretched their necks to see the issue of the search. Availing himself of their negligence, by a sudden exertion of strength and activity Gurth shook himself free of their hold, and might have escaped, could he have resolved to leave his master's property behind him. But such was no part of his intention. He wrenched a quarter-staff from one of the fellows, struck down the Captain, who was altogether unaware of his purpose, and had well-nigh repossessed himself of the pouch and treasure.
The thieves, however, were too nimble for him, and again secured both the bag and the trusty Gurth.

"Knave!" said the Captain, getting up, "thou hast broken my head, and with other men of our sort thou wouldst fare the worse for thy insolence. But thou shalt know thy fate instantly. First let us speak of thy master;
the knight's matters must go before the squire's, according to the due order of chivalry. Stand thou fast in the mean time; if thou stir again, thou shalt have that will make thee quiet for thy life. Comrades!" he then said, addressing his gang, "this purse is embroidered with Hebrew characters, and I well believe the yeoman's tale is true.
The errant knight, his master, must needs pass us toll-free.
He is too like ourselves for us to make booty of him, since dogs should not worry dogs where wolves and foxes are to be found in abundance."

"Like us!" answered one of the gang; "I should like to hear how that is made good."

"Why, thou fool," answered the Captain, "is he not poor and disinherited as we are? Doth he not win his substance at the sword's point as we do? Hath he not beaten Front-de-Bœuf and Malvoisin, even as we would beat them if we could? Is he not the enemy to life and death of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whom we have so much reason to fear? And were all this otherwise, wouldst thou have us show a worse conscience than an unbeliever, a Hebrew Jew?"

"Nay, that were a shame," muttered the other fellow;
"and yet, when I served in the band of stout old Gandelyn, we had no such scruples of conscience. And this insolent peasant—he too, I warrant me, is to be dismissed scathless?"
take eighty zecchins for the good steed and the rich armour, which leaves me not a guider’s profit, have you money to pay me?"

"Barely," said Gurth, though the sum demanded was more reasonable than he expected, "and it will leave my master nigh penniless. Nevertheless, if such be your least offer, I must be content."

"Fill thyself another goblet of wine," said the Jew. "Ah! eighty zecchins is too little. It leaveth no profit for the usages of the monies; and, besides, the good horse may have suffered wrong in this day’s encounter. Oh, it was a hard and a dangerous meeting! man and steed rushing on each other like wild bulls of Bashan! the horse cannot but have had wrong."

"And I say," replied Gurth, "he is sound, wind and limb; and you may see him now in your stable. And I say, over and above, that seventy zecchins is enough for the armour, and I hope a Christian’s word is as good as a Jew’s. If you will not take seventy, I will carry this bag (and he shook it till the contents jingled) back to my master."

"Nay, nay!" said Isaac; "lay down the talents—the shekels—the eighty zecchins; and thou shalt see I will consider thee liberally."

Gurth at length complied; and telling out eighty zecchins upon the table, the Jew delivered out to him an acquittance for the horse and suit of armour. The Jew’s hand trembled for joy as he wrapped up the first seventy pieces of gold. The last ten he told over with much deliberation, pausing, and saying something as he took each piece from the table and dropt it into his purse. It seemed as if his avarice were struggling with his better nature, and compelling him to pouch zecchin after zecchin, while his generosity urged him to restore some part at least to his benefactor, or as a donation to his agent. His whole speech ran nearly thus:

\footnote{Guider. Guelder: a Dutch coin worth about fifty cents.}
\footnote{Bulls of Bashan. See Psalms XXII.12.}
nty-one, seventy-two—thy master is a good seventy-three—an excellent youth—seventy-four eee hath been clipt within the ring—seventy-five at looketh light of weight—seventy-six—when thy ants money, let him come to Isaac of York—sev n—that is, with reasonable security." Here he considerable pause, and Gurth had good hope that three pieces might escape the fate of their com the enumeration proceeded; "Seventy-eight—a good fellow—seventy-nine—and deserve some- thyself—"

the Jew paused again, and looked at the last zec ending, doubtless, to bestow it upon Gurth. He it upon the tip of his finger, and made it ring by it upon the table. Had it rung too flat, or had hair's breadth too light, generosity had carried the unhappily for Gurth, the chime was full and true, in plump, newly coined, and a grain above weight.uld not find in his heart to part with it, so dropt is purse as if in absence of mind, with the words, completes the tale, and I trust thy master will see handsomely. Surely," he added, looking earn the bag, "thou hast more coins in that pouch?"

grinned, which was his nearest approach to a he replied, "About the same quantity which thou told over so carefully." He then folded the quit put it under his cap, adding, "Peril of thy beard, that this be full and ample!" He filled himself, a, a third goblet of wine, and left the apartment ceremony.

becca," said the Jew, "that Ishmaelite hath gone it beyond me. Nevertheless, his master is a good y, and I am well pleased that he hath gained shek ld and shekels of silver, even by the speed of his “Well and yeomanly done!” shouted the robbers; “for play and Old England for ever! The Saxon has saved both his purse and his hide, and the Miller has met his match.”

“Thou mayst go thy ways, my friend,” said the Captain, addressing Gurth, in special confirmation of the general voice, “and I will cause two of my comrades to guide thee by the best way to thy master’s pavilion, and to guard thee from night-walkers that might have less tender consciences than ours; for there is many one of them upon the amble in such a night as this. Take heed, however,” he added sternly; “remember thou hast refused to tell thy name; ask not after ours, nor endeavour to discover who or what we are, for, if thou makest such an attempt, thou wilt come by worse fortune than has yet befallen thee.”

Gurth thanked the Captain for his courtesy, and promised to attend to his recommendation. Two of the outlaws, taking up their quarter-staves, and desiring Gurth to follow close in the rear, walked roundly forward along a bye-path, which traversed the thicket and the broken ground adjacent to it. On the very verge of the thicket two men spoke to his conductors, and receiving an answer in a whisper, withdrew into the wood, and suffered them to pass unmolested. This circumstance induced Gurth to believe both that the gang was strong in numbers, and that they kept regular guards around their place of rendezvous.

When they arrived on the open heath, where Gurth might have had some trouble in finding his road, the thieves guided him straight forward to the top of a little eminence, whence he could see, spread beneath him in the moonlight, the palisades of the lists, the glimmering pavilions pitched at either end, with the pennons which adorned them fluttering in the moonbeam, and from which could be heard the hum of the song with which the sentinels were beguiling their night-watch.

Here the thieves stopt.

“We go with you no farther,” said they; “it were not we should do so. Remember the warning you

d: keep secret what has this night befallen you, Ill have no room to repent it; neglect what is now and the Tower of London shall not protect you revenge.”

ight to you, kind sirs,” said Gurth; “I shall reber orders, and trust that there is no offence in a safer and an honester trade.”
hey parted, the outlaws returning in the direcwhence they had come, and Gurth proceeding to his master, to whom, notwithstanding the injuncd received, he communicated the whole advenevening.

sinherited Knight was filled with astonishment,
the generosity of Rebecca, by which, however,
d he would not profit, than that of the robbers, profession such a quality seemed totally foreign.
of reflections upon these singular circumstances
ver, interrupted by the necessity for taking rethe fatigue of the preceding day and the pro-refreshing himself for the morrow’s encounter like indispensable.

ight, therefore, stretched himself for repose
h couch with which the tent was provided; and l Gurth, extending his hardy limbs upon a bear-formed a sort of carpet to the pavilion, laid him-the opening of the tent, so that no one could ut awakening him.
CHAPTER XII

The heralds left their pricking up and down,
Now ringen trumpets loud and clarion.
There is no more to say, but east and west,
In go the speares sadly in the rest,
In goth the sharp spur into the side,
There see men who can just and who can ride;
There shiver shaftes upon shieldes thick,
He feeleth through the heart-spone the prick;
Up springen speares, twenty feet in height,
Out go the swordes to the silver bright;
The helms they to-hewn and to-shred;
Out bursts the blood with stern streames red.

CHAUCER.

Morning arose in unclouded splendour, and ere the sun was much above the horizon theidlest or the most eager of the spectators appeared on the common, moving to the lists as to a general centre, in order to secure a favourable situation for viewing the continuation of the expected games.

The marshals and their attendants appeared next on the field, together with the heralds, for the purpose of receiving the names of the knights who intended to joust, with the side which each chose to espouse. This was a necessary precaution, in order to secure equality betwixt the two bodies who should be opposed to each other.

According to due formality, the Disinherited Knight was to be considered as leader of the one body, while Brian de Bois-Guilbert, who had been rated as having done second-best in the preceding day, was named first champion of the other band. Those who had concurred in the challenge adhered to his party, of course, excepting only Ralph de Vipont, whom his fall had rendered unfit so soon his armour. There was no want of distinguished candidates to fill up the ranks on either side.

But, although the general tournament, in which all fought at once, was more dangerous than single fights, they were, nevertheless, more frequented and celebrated by the chivalry of the age. Many knights, who had every confidence in their own skill to defy a single and a high reputation, were, nevertheless, desirous of showing their valor in the general combat, where they met others with whom they were more upon equality. On the present occasion, about fifty knights were prepared as desirous of combating upon each side, and the marshals declared that no more could be admitted without the disappointment of several who were too late in sending in their claim to be included.

At the hour of ten o'clock the whole plain was filled with horsemen, horsewomen, and foot-passengers, attending the tournament; and shortly after, a grand fanfare of trumpets announced Prince John and his retinue, attended by many of those knights who meant to be in the game, as well as others who had no such intention.

At the same time arrived Cedric the Saxon, with Rowena, unattended, however, by Athelstane. The lord had arrayed his tall and strong person in order to take his place among the combatants; and, to the surprise of Cedric, had chosen himself on the part of the Knight Templar. The enmity that had existed strongly with his friend from an injudicious choice he had made of his party; but he had only received that sort of answer usually given to one who is more obstinate in following his own opinions than strong in justifying it.

Rest, if not his only, reason for adhering to the cause of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, Athelstane had the prudence to keep to himself. Though his apathy of disposition... sition prevented his taking any means to recommend himself to the Lady Rowena, he was, nevertheless, by no means insensible to her charms, and considered his union with her as a matter already fixed beyond doubt by the assent of Cedric and her other friends. It had therefore, been with smothered displeasure that the proud though indolent Lord of Coningsburgh beheld the victor of the preceding day select Rowena as the object of that honour which it became his privilege to confer. In order to punish him for a preference which seemed to interfere with his own suit, Athelstane, confident of his strength, and to whom his flatterers, at least, ascribed great skill in arms, had determined not only to deprive the Disinherited Knight of his powerful succour, but, if an opportunity should occur, to make him feel the weight of his battle-axe.

De Bracy, and other knights attached to Prince John, in obedience to a hint from him, had joined the party of the challengers, John being desirous to secure, if possible, the victory to that side. On the other hand, many other knights, both English and Norman, natives and strangers, took part against the challengers, the more readily that the opposite band was to be led by so distinguished a champion as the Disinherited Knight had proved himself.

As soon as Prince John observed that the destined Queen of the day had arrived upon the field, assuming that air of courtesy which sat well upon him when he was pleased to exhibit it, he rode forward to meet her, doffed his bonnet, and, alighting from his horse, assisted the Lady Rowena from her saddle, while his followers uncovered at the same time, and one of the most distinguished dismounted to hold her palfrey.

"It is thus," said Prince John, "that we set the dutiful example of loyalty to the Queen of Love and Beauty, and are ourselves her guide to the throne which she must this day occupy. Ladies," he said, "attend your Queen, as you wish in your turn to be distinguished by like honours."
saying, the Prince marshalled Rowena to the seat of our opposite his own, while the fairest and most distinguished ladies present crowded after her to obtain places as
as possible to their temporary sovereign.

So sooner was Rowena seated than a burst of music, drowned by the shouts of the multitude, greeted her dignity. Meantime, the sun shone fierce and bright the polished arms of the knights of either side, who ded the opposite extremities of the lists, and held eager rence together concerning the best mode of arranging line of battle and supporting the conflict.

The heralds then proclaimed silence until the laws of ourney should be rehearsed. These were calculated in degree to abate the dangers of the day—a precaution more necessary as the conflict was to be maintained sharp swords and pointed lances.

The champions were therefore prohibited to thrust with word, and were confined to striking. A knight, it was ounced, might use a mace or battle-axe at pleasure;
the dagger was a prohibited weapon. A knight uned might renew the fight on foot with any other on the site side in the same predicament; but mounted men were in that case forbidden to assail him. When knight could force his antagonist to the extremity of ists, so as to touch the palisade with his person or , such opponent was obliged to yield himself van-ed, and his armour and horse were placed at the dist of the conqueror. A knight thus overcome was not itted to take farther share in the combat. If any batant was struck down, and unable to recover his feet, quire or page might enter the lists and drag his master of the press; but in that case the knight was adjudged ished, and his arms and horse declared forfeited.
combat was to cease as soon as Prince John should

ACE. A heavy club armed with spikes, or plated, swung with one hand. ed to crush in the armor of an opponent.
throw down his leading staff, or truncheon—another precaution usually taken to prevent the unnecessary effusion of blood by the too long endurance of a sport so desperate. Any knight breaking the rules of the tournament, or otherwise transgressing the rules of honourable chivalry, was liable to be stript of his arms, and, having his shield reversed, to be placed in that posture astride upon the bars of the palisade, and exposed to public derision, in punishment of his unknighthly conduct. Having announced these precautions, the heralds concluded with an exhortation to each good knight to do his duty, and to merit favour from the Queen of Beauty and Love.

This proclamation having been made, the heralds withdrew to their stations. The knights, entering at either end of the lists in long procession, arranged themselves in a double file, precisely opposite to each other, the leader of each party being in the centre of the foremost rank, a post which he did not occupy until each had carefully arranged the ranks of his party, and stationed every one in his place.

It was a goodly, and at the same time an anxious, sight to behold so many gallant champions, mounted bravely and armed richly, stand ready prepared for an encounter so formidable, seated on their war-saddles like so many pillars of iron, and awaiting the signal of encounter with the same ardour as their generous steeds, which, by neighing and pawing the ground, gave signal of their impatience.

As yet the knights held their long lances upright, their bright points glancing to the sun, and the streamers with which they were decorated fluttering over the plumage of the helmets. Thus they remained while the marshals of the field surveyed their ranks with the utmost exactness, lest either party had more or fewer than the appointed number. The tale was found exactly complete. The marshals then withdrew from the lists, and William de Wyvil, with a voice of thunder, pronounced the signal words,
The trumpets sounded as he spoke; the arms of the champions were at once lowered and placed to rests; the spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses; and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed at each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock the sound of which was heard at a great distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors, of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly apparent for the dust raised by the trampling of so many feet darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious onlookers could see the fate of the encounter. When the dust became visible, half the knights on each side were prostrate—some by the dexterity of their adversary's attack, some by the superior weight and strength of opponent which had borne down both horse and man; some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise; some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament; and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their own bleeding by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose horses had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and the issue of the combat depended on them.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of de Bois-Guilbert shouted: "Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple! For the Temple!"

Sez aller!" The trumpets sounded as he spoke; the arms of the champions were at once lowered and placed to rests; the spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses; and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed at each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock the sound of which was heard at a great distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors, of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly apparent for the dust raised by the trampling of so many feet darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious onlookers could see the fate of the encounter. When the dust became visible, half the knights on each side were prostrate—some by the dexterity of their adversary’s attack, some by the superior weight and strength of opponent which had borne down both horse and man; some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise; some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament; and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their own bleeding by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose horses had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and the issue of the combat depended on them.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of de Bois-Guilbert shouted: "Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple! For the Temple!"

Sez aller!" The trumpets sounded as he spoke; the arms of the champions were at once lowered and placed to rests; the spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses; and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed at each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock the sound of which was heard at a great distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors, of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly apparent for the dust raised by the trampling of so many feet darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious onlookers could see the fate of the encounter. When the dust became visible, half the knights on each side were prostrate—some by the dexterity of their adversary’s attack, some by the superior weight and strength of opponent which had borne down both horse and man; some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise; some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament; and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their own bleeding by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose horses had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and the issue of the combat depended on them.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of de Bois-Guilbert shouted: "Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple! For the Temple!"

Sez aller!" The trumpets sounded as he spoke; the arms of the champions were at once lowered and placed to rests; the spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses; and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed at each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock the sound of which was heard at a great distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors, of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly apparent for the dust raised by the trampling of so many feet darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious onlookers could see the fate of the encounter. When the dust became visible, half the knights on each side were prostrate—some by the dexterity of their adversary’s attack, some by the superior weight and strength of opponent which had borne down both horse and man; some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise; some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament; and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their own bleeding by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose horses had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and the issue of the combat depended on them.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of de Bois-Guilbert shouted: "Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple! For the Temple!"

Sez aller!" The trumpets sounded as he spoke; the arms of the champions were at once lowered and placed to rests; the spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses; and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed at each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock the sound of which was heard at a great distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors, of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly apparent for the dust raised by the trampling of so many feet darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious onlookers could see the fate of the encounter. When the dust became visible, half the knights on each side were prostrate—some by the dexterity of their adversary’s attack, some by the superior weight and strength of opponent which had borne down both horse and man; some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise; some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament; and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their own bleeding by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose horses had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and the issue of the combat depended on them.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of de Bois-Guilbert shouted: "Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple! For the Temple!"
site party shouted in answer; "Desdichado! Desdichado!" which watchword they took from the motto upon their leader's shield.

The champions thus encountering each other with the utmost fury, and with alternate success, the tide of battle seemed to flow now toward the southern, now toward the northern, extremity of the lists, as the one or the other party prevailed. Meantime the clang of the blows and the shouts of the combatants mixed fearfully with the sound of the trumpets, and drowned the groans of those who fell, and lay rolling defenceless beneath the feet of the horses. The splendid armour of the combatants was now defaced with dust and blood, and gave way at every stroke of the sword and battle-axe. The gay plumage, shorn from the crests, drifted upon the breeze like snow-flakes. All that was beautiful and graceful in the martial array had disappeared, and what was now visible was only calculated to awake terror or compassion.

Yet such is the force of habit, that not only the vulgar spectators, who are naturally attracted by sights of horror, but even the ladies of distinction, who crowded the galleries, saw the conflict with a thrilling interest certainly, but without a wish to withdraw their eyes from a sight so terrible. Here and there, indeed, a fair cheek might turn pale, or a faint scream might be heard, as a lover, a brother, or a husband was struck from his horse. But, in general, the ladies around encouraged the combatants, not only by clapping their hands and waving their veils and kerchiefs, but even by exclaiming, "Brave lance! Good sword!" when any successful thrust or blow took place under their observation.

Such being the interest taken by the fair sex in this bloody game, that of the men is the more easily understood. It showed itself in loud acclamations upon every change of fortune, while all eyes were so riveted on the lists that the spectators seemed as if they themselves had dealt s ved the blows which were there so freely bestowed. And een every pause was heard the voice of the heralds iming, “Fight on, brave knights! Man dies, but glory Fight on; death is better than defeat! Fight on,
ights! for bright eyes behold your deeds!”
Amid the varied fortunes of the combat, the eyes of endeavoured to discover the leaders of each band, who, gling in the thick of the fight, encouraged their com-ons both by voice and example. Both displayed greatof gallantry, nor did either Bois-Guilbert or the Disited Knight find in the ranks opposed to them a ion who could be termed their unquestioned match.
repeatedly endeavoured to single out each other,ed by mutual animosity, and aware that the fall of leader might be considered as decisive of victory.
, however, was the crowd and confusion that, during earlier part of the conflict, their efforts to meet were ailing, and they were repeatedly separated by the ness of their followers, each of whom was anxious to honour by measuring his strength against the leader
the opposite party.
But when the field became thin by the numbers on er side who had yielded themselves vanquished, had compelled to the extremity of the lists, or been other-rendered incapable of continuing the strife, the Tem-and the Disinherited Knight at length encountered d to hand, with all the fury that mortal animosity, ed to rivalry of honour, could inspire. Such was the ess of each in parrying and striking, that the spectators forth into a unanimous and involuntary shout, exeive of their delight and admiration.
But at this moment the party of the Disinherited ight had the worst; the gigantic arm of Front-de-Bœuf
the one flank, and the ponderous strength of Athelstane
the other, bearing down and dispersing those imme-exposed to them. Finding themselves freed from their immediate antagonists, it seems to have occurred to both these knights at the same instant that they would render the most decisive advantage to their party by aiding the Templar in his contest with his rival. Turning their horses, therefore, at the same moment, the Norman spurred against the Disinherited Knight on the one side and the Saxon on the other. It was utterly impossible that the object of this unequal and unexpected assault could have sustained it, had he not been warned by a general cry from the spectators, who could not but take interest in one exposed to such disadvantage.

"Beware! beware! Sir Disinherited!" was shouted so universally that the knight became aware of his danger; and striking a full blow at the Templar, he reined back his steed in the same moment, so as to escape the charge of Athelstane and Front-de-Boeuf. These knights, therefore, their aim being thus eluded, rushed from opposite sides betwixt the object of their attack and the Templar, almost running their horses against each other ere they could stop their career. Recovering their horses, however, and wheeling them round, the whole three pursued their united purpose of bearing to the earth the Disinherited Knight.

Nothing could have saved him except the remarkable strength and activity of the noble horse which he had won on the preceding day.

This stood him in the more stead, as the horse of Bois-Guilbert was wounded, and those of Front-de-Boeuf and Athelstane were both tired with the weight of their gigantic masters, clad in complete armour, and with the preceding exertions of the day. The masterly horsemanship of the Disinherited Knight, and the activity of the noble animal which he mounted, enabled him for a few minutes to keep at sword's point his three antagonists, turning and wheeling with the agility of a hawk upon the wing, keeping his enemies as far separate as he could, and rushing as inst the one, now against the other, dealing sweeping wars with his sword, without waiting to receive those which were aimed at him in return.
But although the lists rang with the applauses of his sterity, it was evident that he must at last be overpowd; and the nobles around Prince John implored him one voice to throw down his warder, and to save so e a knight from the disgrace of being overcome by ls.
“Not I, by the light of Heaven!” answered Prince John;
ay same springal, 1 who conceals his name and despises
proffered hospitality, hath already gained one prize, I may now afford to let others have their turn.” As he ke thus, an unexpected incident changed the fortune
the day.
There was among the ranks of the Disinherited Knight champion in black armour, mounted on a black horse, ge of size, tall, and to all appearance powerful and strong,
e the rider by whom he was mounted. This knight, o bore on his shield no device of any kind, had hitherto iced very little interest in the event of the fight, beating with seeming ease those combatants who attacked him,
t neither pursuing his advantages nor himself assailing
one. In short, he had hitherto acted the part rather a spectator than of a party in the tournament, a circum-
ce which procured him among the spectators the name
Le Noir Faineant, or the Black Sluggard.
At once this knight seemed to throw aside his apathy,
en he discovered the leader of his party so hard bested;
setting spurs to his horse, which was quite fresh, he se to his assistance like a thunderbolt, exclaiming, in a ce like a trumpet-call, “Desdichado, to the rescue!” It high time; for, while the Disinherited Knight was ssing upon the Templar, Front-de-Bœuf had got nigh

Youngster; used contemptuously. The word was used seri of a simile youth, and is from spring.
to him with his uplifted sword; but ere the blow could descend, the Sable Knight dealt a stroke on his head, which, glancing from the polished helmet, lighted with violence scarcely abated on the chamfron\(^1\) of the steed, and Front-de-Bœuf rolled on the ground, both horse and man equally stunned by the fury of the blow. Le Noir Fâneant then turned his horse upon Athelstane of Coningsburgh; and his own sword having been broken in his encounter with Front-de-Bœuf, he wrenched from the hand of the bulky Saxon the battle-axe which he wielded, and, like one familiar with the use of the weapon, bestowed him such a blow upon the crest that Athelstane also lay senseless on the field. Having achieved this double feat, for which he was the more highly applauded that it was totally unexpected from him, the knight seemed to resume the sluggishness of his character, returning calmly to the northern extremity of the lists, leaving his leader to cope as he best could with Brian de Bois-Guilbert. This was no longer matter of so much difficulty as formerly. The Templar’s horse had bled much, and gave way under the shock of the Disinherited Knight’s charge. Brian de Bois-Guilbert rolled on the field, encumbered with the stirrup, from which he was unable to draw his foot. His antagonist sprang from horseback, waved his fatal sword over the head of his adversary, and commanded him to yield himself; when Prince John, more moved by the Templar’s dangerous situation that he had been by that of his rival, saved him the mortification of confessing himself vanquished by casting down his warder and putting an end to the conflict.

It was, indeed, only the relics and embers of the fight which continued to burn; for of the few knights who still continued in the lists, the greater part had, by tacit consent, forborne the conflict for some time, leaving it to be determined by the strife of the leaders.

The squires, who had found it a matter of danger and

\(^1\) Chamfron. The ornamented front piece of a horse’s head-armor.
to attend their masters during the engagement, marched into the lists to pay their dutiful attendance. Wounded, who were removed with the utmost care to the neighbouring pavilions, or to the quarters for them in the adjoining village.

ended the memorable field of Ashby-de-la-Zouche, the most gallantly contested tournaments of that. Although only four knights, including one who died by the heat of his armour, had died upon the upwards of thirty were desperately wounded, four of whom never recovered. Several more were disabled; and those who escaped best carried the marks of conflict to the grave with them. Hence it is always heard in the old records as the “gentle and joyous arms of Ashby.”

Being now the duty of Prince John to name the who had done best, he determined that the honour remaine with the knight whom the popular and termed Le Noir Faineant. It was pointed out by the Prince, in impeachment of this decree, that the victor in fact won by the Disinherited Knight, who, on the half of the day, had overcome six champions with his hand, and who had finally unhorsed and struck the leader of the opposite party. But Prince John, to his own opinion, on the ground that the Disinherited Knight and his party had lost the day but for the assistance of the Knight of the Black Armour, therefore, he persisted in awarding the prize.

The surprise of all present, however, the knight thus selected was nowhere to be found. He had left the lists immediately when the conflict ceased, and had been by some spectators to move down one of the forest paths with the same slow pace and listless and indifferent which had procured him the epithet of the Black. After he had been summoned twice by sound and proclamation of the heralds, it became necessary to name another to receive the honours which had been assigned to him. Prince John had now no other excuse for resisting the claim of the Disinherited Knight, whom, therefore, he named the champion of the day.

Through a field slippery with blood and encumbered with broken armour and the bodies of slain and wounded horses, the marshals of the lists again conducted the victor to the foot of Prince John's throne.

"Disinherited Knight," said Prince John, "since you that title only you will consent to be known to us, we will second time award to you the honours of this tournament and announce to you your right to claim and receive from the hands of the Queen of Love and Beauty the chaplet of honour which your valour has justly deserved."

The Knight bowed low and gracefully, but returned no answer.

While the trumpets sounded, while the heralds strung their voices in proclaiming honour to the brave and giving joy to the victor, while ladies waved their silken kerchiefs and embroidered veils, and while all ranks joined in a clamorous shout of exultation, the marshals conducted the disinherited Knight across the lists to the foot of that throne of honour which was occupied by the Lady Rowena.

On the lower step of this throne the champion was made to kneel down. Indeed, his whole action since the battle had ended seemed rather to have been upon the impulse of those around him than from his own free will; and it was observed that he tottered as they guided him the second time across the lists. Rowena, descending from her position with a graceful and dignified step, was about to place the chaplet which she held in her hand upon the head of the champion, when the marshals exclaimed with her voice, "It must not be thus; his head must be bare."

The knight muttered faintly a few words, which were not low of his helmet; but their purport seemed to be that his casque might not be removed.

Whether from love of form or from curiosity, the mar-uid no attention to his expressions of reluctance, but ed him by cutting the laces of his casque, and un-ning of his gorget. When the helmet was rethe well-formed yet sunburnt features of a young twenty-five were seen, amidst a profusion of short ir. His countenance was as pale as death, and in one or two places with streaks of blood.

vena had no sooner beheld him than she uttered a rick; but at once summoning up the energy of her ion, and compelling herself, as it were, to proceed, her frame yet trembled with the violence of sudden s, she placed upon the drooping head of the victor andid chaplet which was the destined reward of the d pronounced in a clear and distinct tone these “I bestow on thee this chaplet, Sir Knight, as the f valour assigned to this day’s victor.” Here she a moment, and then firmly added, “And upon more worthy could a wreath of chivalry never be knight stooped his head and kissed the hand of the Sovereign by whom his valour had been rewarded; n, sinking yet farther forward, lay prostrate at her re was a general consternation. Cedric, who had stuck mute by the sudden appearance of his banished w rushed forward, as if to separate him from. But this had been already accomplished by the s of the field, who, guessing the cause of Ivanhoe’s had hastened to undo his armour, and found that the a lance had penetrated his breastplate and inflicted i in his side.

CHAPTER XIII

"Heroes, approach!" Atrides thus aloud;
"Stand forth distinguish'd from the circling crowd,
Ye who by skill or manly force may claim
Your rivals to surpass and merit fame,
This cow, worth twenty oxen, is decreed
For him who farthest sends the winged reed."

Iliad.

The name of Ivanhoe was no sooner pronounced than it flew from mouth to mouth with all the celerity with which eagerness could convey and curiosity receive it. It was not long ere it reached the circle of the Prince, whose brow darkened as he heard the news. Looking around him however, with an air of scorn, "My lords," said he, "especially you, Sir Prior, what think ye of the doctrine I learned tell us concerning innate attractions and antipathies? Methinks that I felt the presence of my brother minion, even when I least guessed whom yonder suit of armour inclosed."

"Front-de-Bœuf must prepare to restore his fief of Ivanhoe," said De Bracy, who, having discharged his part honourably in the tournament, had laid his shield and helm aside, and again mingled with the Prince’s retinue.

"Ay," answered Waldemar Fitzurse, "this gallant is likely to reclaim the castle and manor which Richard assigned to him, and which your Highness’s generosity has since given to Front-de-Bœuf."

"Front-de-Bœuf," replied John, "is a man more willing to swallow three manors such as Ivanhoe than to disgo..."
them. For the rest, sirs, I hope none here will deny the right to confer the fiefs of the crown upon the faithful vassals who are around me, and ready to perform the military service, in the room of those who have wanted service when called upon."

The audience were too much interested in the question to pronounce the Prince’s assumed right altogether irritable. “A generous Prince! a most noble Lord, who takes upon himself the task of rewarding his faithful followers!”

Which were the words which burst from the train, expectant of them of similar grants at the expense of King Richard’s followers and favourites, if indeed they had not received such. Prior Aymer also assented to the old proposition, observing, however, “That the blessed land could not indeed be termed a foreign country. was communis mater—the mother of all Christians. He saw not,” he declared, “how the Knight of Ivanhoe might plead any advantage from this, since he (the Prior) assured that the crusaders under Richard had never pressed much farther than Askalon, which, as all the knew, was a town of the Philistines, and entitled to of the privileges of the Holy City.”

Aldemar, whose curiosity had led him towards the where Ivanhoe had fallen to the ground, now rel. “The gallant,” said he, “is likely to give your presence little disturbance, and to leave Front-de-Bœuf quiet possession of his gains; he is severely wounded.” Whatever becomes of him,” said Prince John, “he is of the day; and were he tenfold our enemy, or the friend of our brother, which is perhaps the same, wounds must be looked to; our own physician shall him.”

evern smile curled the Prince’s lip as he spoke. Watdebar Fitzurse hastened to reply that Ivanhoe was already removed from the lists, and in the custody of his friends.

"I was somewhat afflicted," he said, "to see the grief with which the Queen of Love and Beauty, whose sovereignty of a day this event has changed into mourning. I am not a man to be moved by a woman's lament for her lover, but this same Lady Rowena suppressed her sorrow with such dignity of manner that it could only be discovered by her folded hands and her tearless eye, which trembled as it remained fixed on the lifeless form before her."

"Who is this Lady Rowena," said Prince John, "of whom we have heard so much?"

"A Saxon heiress of large possessions," replied the Prior Aymer; "a rose of loveliness, and a jewel of wealth; the fairest among a thousand, a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire." 1

"We shall cheer her sorrows," said Prince John, "and amend her blood, by wedding her to a Norman. She seems a minor, and must therefore be at our royal disposal in marriage. How sayst thou, De Bracy? What thinkst thou of gaining fair lands and livings, by wedding a Saxon, after the fashion of the followers of the Conqueror?"

"If the lands are to my liking, my lord," answered De Bracy, "it will be hard to displease me with a bride; and deeply will I hold myself bound to your Highness for a good deed, which will fulfil all promises made in favour of your servant and vassal."

"We will not forget it," said Prince John; "and that we may instantly go to work, command our seneschal presently to order the attendance of the Lady Rowena and her company—that is, the rude churl her guardian, and the Saxon ox whom the Black Knight struck down in the tournament—upon this evening's banquet. De Bigot," he added to his seneschal, "thou wilt word this our second summons so courteously as to gratify the pride of these Saxons, and 1 Bundle of myrrh, etc. See Song of Solomon 1. 13, 14.

it impossible for them again to refuse; although, by touches of Becket,¹ courtesy to them is casting pearls be-wine.”

ince John had proceeded thus far, and was about to he signal for retiring from the lists, when a small was put into his hand.

rom whence?” said Prince John, looking at the per-whom it was delivered.

rom foreign parts, my lord, but from whence I know replied his attendant. “A Frenchman brought it who said he had ridden night and day to put it into nds of your Highness.”

e Prince looked narrowly at the superscription, and at the seal, placed so as to secure the floss-silk² with the billet was surrounded, and which bore the inon of three fleurs-de-lis. John then opened the billet apparent agitation, which visibly and greatly increased he had perused the contents, which were expressed in words:

ake heed to yourself, for the Devil is unchained!”

e Prince turned as pale as death, looked first on the
and then up to heaven, like a man who has received hat sentence of execution has been passed upon him.
ering from the first effects of his surprise, he took mar Fitzurse and De Bracy aside, and put the billet ir hands successively. “It means,” he added, in a ng voice, “that my brother Richard has obtained his m.”

his may be a false alarm or a forged letter,” said De is France’s own hand and seal,”³ replied Prince

---

¹ Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, assassinated at of Henry II. and afterward canonized by the church. The shrine of was the most popular one in England, and was the resort of thousands us, including those made famous by Chaucer.
² floss-silk; soft, untwisted silk.
³ France’s Own Hand, etc. The hand of King Philip of France, who was John.
"It is time, then," said Fitzurse, "to draw our party to a head, either at York or some other central place. A few days later, and it will be indeed too late. Your Highness must break short this present mummeries."

"The yeomen and commons," said De Bracy, "must not be dismissed discontented, for lack of their share in the sports."

"The day," said Waldemar, "is not yet very far spent; let the archers shoot a few rounds at the target, and the prize be adjudged. This will be an abundant fulfilment of the Prince's promises, so far as this herd of Saxon serfs is concerned."

"I thank thee, Waldemar," said the Prince; "thou remindest me, too, that I have a debt to pay to that insolent peasant who yesterday insulted our person. Our banquet also shall go forward to-night as we proposed. Were this my last hour of power, it should be an hour sacred to revenge and to pleasure; let new cares come with to-morrow's new day."

The sound of the trumpets soon recalled those spectators who had already begun to leave the field; and proclamation was made that Prince John, suddenly called by high and peremptory public duties, held himself obliged to discontinue the entertainments of to-morrow's festival; nevertheless, that, unwilling so many good yeomen should depart without a trial of skill, he was pleased to appoint them, before leaving the ground, presently to execute the competition of archery intended for the morrow. To the best archer a prize was to be awarded, being a bugle-horn, mounted with silver, and a silken baldric richly ornamented with a medallion of St. Hubert, the patron of silvan sport.

More than thirty yeomen at first presented themselves as competitors, several of whom were rangers and underkeepers in the royal forests of Needwood and Charnwood. When, however, the archers understood with whom they be matched, upwards of twenty withdrew themselves from the contest, unwilling to encounter the distasteful almost certain defeat. For in those days the much celebrated marksman was as well known for his round him as the qualities of a horse trained at set are familiar to those who frequent that well-setting.

1 CENTRAL. Central.

A diminished list of competitors for silvan fame still to eight. Prince John stepped from his royal pew more nearly the persons of those chosen yeomen of whom wore the royal livery. Having satis-fiety by this investigation, he looked for the dissentiment, whom he observed standing on the and with the same composed countenance which exhibited upon the preceding day.

Now,” said Prince John, “I guessed by thy insolent un wert no true lover of the long-bow, and I see not adventure thy skill among such merry men wonder.”

For favour, sir,” replied the yeoman, “I have another refraining to shoot, besides the fearing discom-fuse.”

What is thy other reason?” said Prince John, who, cause which perhaps he could not himself have felt a painful curiosity respecting this indi-use,” replied the woodsman, “I know not if these and I are used to shoot at the same marks; and be-never, I know not how your Grace might relish ing of a third prize by one who has unwittingly mer your displeasure.”

John coloured as he put the question, “What is yeoman?”

“Locksley,” answered the yeoman.

“Locksley,” said Prince John, “thou shalt shoot when these yeomen have displayed their skill.
If thou carriest the prize, I will add to it twenty nobles; but if thou losest it, thou shalt be stript of thy lining green and scourged out of the lists with bowstrings, for wordy and insolent braggart."

"And how if I refuse to shoot on such a wager?" said the yeoman. "Your Grace's power, supported, as it is, by many men-at-arms, may indeed Easily strip and scourge, but cannot compel me to bend or to draw my bow."

"If thou refusest my fair proffer," said the Prince, provost of the lists shall cut thy bowstring, break thy bow and arrows, and expel thee from the presence as a hearted craven."

"This is no fair chance you put on me, proud Prince," said the yeoman, "to compel me to peril myself against the best archers of Leicester and Staffordshire, under the penalty of infamy if they should overshoot me. Nevertheless, I will obey your pleasure."

"Look to him close, men-at-arms," said Prince, "his heart is sinking; I am jealous lest he attempt to escape the trial. And do you, good fellows, shoot boldly round a buck and a butt of wine are ready for your refreshment yonder tent, when the prize is won."

A target was placed at the upper end of the south avenue which led to the lists. The contending archers, after their station in turn, at the bottom of the southern end of the distance between that station and the mark allowed them for what was called a shot at rovers. The archers having previously determined by lot their order of precedence, were to shoot each three shafts in succession. The sports were regulated by an officer of inferior rank, termed the provost of the games; for the high rank of the marshals of the lists would have been held degraded if they condescended to superintend the sports of the manry.

Nobles. Gold coins worth about a dollar and a half.

Rovers. With an elevation; not on the line.
one by one the archers, stepping forward, delivered shafts yeomanlike and bravely. Of twenty-four shot in succession, ten were fixed in the target, and others ranged so near it that, considering the distance mark, it was accounted good archery. Of the ten which hit the target, two within the inner ring were by Hubert, a forester in the service of Malvoisin, who accordingly pronounced victorious.

"Now, Locksley," said Prince John to the bold yeoman, in bitter smile, "wilt thou try conclusions with Hubert,
it thou yield up bow, baldric, and quiver to the proof the sports?"

"Sith it be no better," said Locksley, "I am content to my fortune; on condition that when I have shot two at yonder mark of Hubert's, he shall be bound to one at that which I shall propose."

"That is but fair," answered Prince John, "and it shall be refused thee. If thou dost beat this braggart,
I will fill the bugle with silver pennies for thee."

"A man can but do his best," answered Hubert; "but windsor drew a good long bow at Hastings, and I trust to dishonour his memory."

The former target was now removed, and a fresh one of the same size placed in its room. Hubert, who, as victor in the first trial of skill, had the right to shoot first, took his with great deliberation, long measuring the distance his eye, while he held in his hand his bended bow, with arrow placed on the string. At length he made a step ward, and raising the bow at the full stretch of his left till the centre or grasping place was nigh level with his drew his bowstring to his ear. The arrow whistled through the air, and lighted within the inner ring of the target, but not exactly in the centre.

You have not allowed for the wind, Hubert," said his mother. Since the old form was sithens.
antagonist, bending his bow, "or that had been a better shot."

So saying, and without showing the least anxiety or pause upon his aim, Locksley stept to the appointed station and shot his arrow as carelessly in appearance as if he had not even looked at the mark. He was speaking almost at the instant that the shaft left the bowstring, yet it alighted in the target two inches nearer to the white spot which marked the centre than that of Hubert.

"By the light of Heaven!" said Prince John to Hubert, "an thou suffer that runagate1 knave to overcome thee, thou art worthy of the gallows!"

Hubert had but one set speech for all occasions. "An your Highness were to hang me," he said, "a man can but do his best. Nevertheless, my grandsire drew a good bow——"

"The foul fiend on thy grandsire and all his generation!" interrupted John. "Shoot, knave, and shoot thy best, or it shall be the worse for thee!"

Thus exhorted, Hubert resumed his place, and not neglecting the caution which he had received from his adversary, he made the necessary allowance for a very light air of wind which had just arisen, and shot so successfully that his arrow alighted in the very centre of the target.

"A Hubert! a Hubert!" shouted the populace, more interested in a known person than in a stranger. "In the clout!2 in the clout! a Hubert for ever!"

"Thou canst not mend that shot, Locksley," said the Prince, with an insulting smile.

"I will notch his shaft for him, however," replied Locksley.

And letting fly his arrow with a little more precaution than before, it lighted right upon that of his competitor.

---

1 Runagate. Renegade: one who renounces his faith; from Latin renegare, to deny.
2 Clout. The bull's-eye; perhaps marked at first by a clout; i.e., a piece of white cloth.
t split to shivers. The people who stood around astonished at his wonderful dexterity that they not even give vent to their surprise in their usual “This must be the devil, and no man of flesh and whispered the yeomen to each other; “such archery ever seen since a bow was first bent in Britain.”
d now,” said Locksley, “I will crave your Grace’s Don to plant such a mark as is used in the North;
and welcome every brave yeoman who shall try it to win a smile from the bonny lass he loves best.”
then turned to leave the lists. “Let your guards me,” he said, “if you please; I go but to cut a rod next willow-bush.”
ince John made a signal that some attendants should him in case of his escape; but the cry of “Shame!
which burst from the multitude induced him to ungenerous purpose.
kesley returned almost instantly with a willow wand six feet in length, perfectly straight, and rather than a man’s thumb. He began to peel this with mposure, observing at the same time that to ask a odsmen to shoot at a target so broad as had hitherto d was to put shame upon his skill. “For his own
he said, “and in the land where he was bred, men soon take for their mark King Arthur’s round which held sixty knights around it. A child of seven l,” he said, “might hit yonder target with a headless ut,” added he, walking deliberately to the other end ists, and sticking the willow wand upright in the “he that hits that rod at fivescore yards, I call him er fit to bear both bow and quiver before a king, an the stout King Richard himself.”
grand sire,” said Hubert, “drew a good bow at the of Hastings, and never shot at such a mark in his life.
ether will I. If this yeoman can cleave that rod
I give him the bucklers; or rather, I yield to the devil that is in his jerkin, and not to any human skill; a man can but do his best, and I will not shoot where I am sure to miss. I might as well shoot at the edge of our parson’s whittle, or at a wheat straw, or at a sunbeam, as at a twinkling white streak which I can hardly see.”

“Cowardly dog!” said Prince John. “Sirrah Locksley, do thou shoot; but if thou hittest such a mark, I will say thou art the first man ever did so. Howe’er it be, thou shalt not crow over us with a mere show of superior skill.”

“I will do my best, as Hubert says,” answered Locksley; “no man can do more.”

So saying, he again bent his bow, but on the present occasion looked with attention to his weapon, and changed the string, which he thought was no longer truly round, having been a little frayed by the two former shots. He then took his aim with some deliberation, and the multitude awaited the event in breathless silence. The archer vindicated their opinion of his skill: his arrow split the willow rod against which it was aimed. A jubilee of acclamations followed; and even Prince John, in admiration of Locksley’s skill, lost for an instant his dislike to his person. “These twenty nobles,” he said, “which, with the bugle, thou hast fairly won, are thine own; we will make them fifty if thou wilt take livery and service with us as a yeoman of our body-guard, and be near to our person. For never did so strong a hand bend a bow or so true an eye direct a shaft.”

“Pardon me, noble Prince,” said Locksley; “but I have vowed that, if ever I take service, it should be with your royal brother King Richard. These twenty nobles I leave to Hubert, who has this day drawn as brave a bow as his grandsire did at Hastings. Had his modesty not refused the trial he would have hit the wand as well as I.”

1 Bucklers. Small round shields carried on the arm; the usual prize in contests at sword-play.
Hubert shook his head as he received with reluctance bounty of the stranger; and Locksley, anxious to escape her observation, mixed with the crowd, and was seen no ere.

The victorious archer would not perhaps have escaped men's attention so easily, had not that Prince had other objects of anxious and more important meditation pressing upon his mind at that instant. He called upon his umberlain as he gave the signal for retiring from the lists, commanding him instantly to gallop to Ashby and seek Isaac the Jew. "Tell the dog," he said, "to send me, before sundown, two thousand crowns. He knows the urity; but thou mayst show him this ring for a token.
rest of the money must be paid at York within six days. If he neglects, I will have the unbelieving villain's head. Look that thou pass him not on the way; for the circum-
d slave was displaying his stolen finery amongst us."

So saying, the Prince resumed his horse, and returned to Ashby, the whole crowd breaking up and dispersing upon retreat.
CHAPTER XIV

In rough magnificence array'd,
When ancient chivalry display'd
The pomp of her heroic games,
And crested chiefs and tissued dames Assembled, at the clarion's call,
In some proud castle's high arch'd hall.

Warton.

Prince John held his high festival in the Castle of Ashby. This was not the same building of which the ruins still interest the traveller, and which was erected in a later period by the Lord Hastings, High Chamberlain of England, one of the first victims of the tyranny of Richard the Third, and yet better known as one of Shakespeare's characters than by his historical fame. The castle in the town of Ashby, at this time, belonged to Roger de Quincy, Earl of Winchester, who, during the period of our history, was absent in the Holy Land. Prince John, in the meantime, occupied his castle, and disposed of his domains without scruple; and seeking at present to dazzle men's eyes with his hospitality and magnificence, had given orders for his preparations, in order to render the banquet as splendid as possible.

The purveyors of the Prince, who exercised on other occasions the full authority of royalty, had swept the country of all that could be collected which was suitable for their master's table. Guests also were invited in great numbers; and in the necessity in which he then found himself of courting popularity, Prince John had extended his invitation to a few distinguished Saxon and Danish... as well as to the Norman nobility and gentry of the bourhood. However despised and degraded on ordicasions, the great numbers of the Anglo-Saxons

ecessarily render them formidable in the civil com-
s which seemed approaching, and it was an obvious of policy to secure popularity with their leaders.

was accordingly the Prince’s intention, which he for time maintained, to treat these unwonted guests with courtesy to which they had been little accustomed. But ough no man with less scruple made his ordinary habits feelings bend to his interest, it was the misfortune of Prince that his levity and petulance were perpetually ing out, and undoing all that had been gained by his ous dissimulation.

this fickle temper he gave a memorable example in ad, when sent thither by his father, Henry the Second,
the purpose of buying golden opinions of the inhab-
of that new and important acquisition to the English

Upon this occasion the Irishchieftains contended should first offer to the young Prince their loyal ge and the kiss of peace. But, instead of receiving salutations with courtesy, John and his petulant atents could not resist the temptation of pulling the long of the Irishchieftains—a conduct which, as might been expected, was highly resented by these insulted
aries, and produced fatal consequences to the English ation in Ireland. It is necessary to keep these inconcies of John’s character in view, that the reader may stand his conduct during the present evening.

execution of the resolution which he had formed duris cooler moments, Prince John received Cedric and stane with distinguished courtesy, and expressed his pointment, without resentment, when the indisposi-Rowena was alleged by the former as a reason for her tending upon his gracious summons. Cedric and ane were both dressed in the ancient Saxon gar which, although not unhandsome in itself, and in the present instance composed of costly materials, was so remote in shape and appearance from that of the other guests that Prince John took great credit to himself with Waldemar Fitzurse for refraining from laughter at a sight which the fashion of the day rendered ridiculous. Yet, in the eye of sober judgment, the short close tunic and long mantle of the Saxons was a more graceful, as well as a more convenient, dress than the garb of the Normans, whose undergarment was a long doublet, so loose as to resemble a shirt or waggoner’s frock, covered by a cloak of scanty dimensions, neither fit to defend the wearer from cold or from rain, and the only purpose of which appeared to be to display as much fur, embroidery, and jewellery work as the ingenuity of the tailor could contrive to lay upon it. The Emperor Charlemagne, in whose reign they were first introduced, seems to have been very sensible of the inconveniences arising from the fashion of this garment. “In Heaven’s name,” said he, “to what purpose serve these abridged cloaks? If we are in bed they are no cover, on horseback they are no protection from the wind and rain, and when seated they do not guard our legs from the damp or the frost.”

Nevertheless, spite of this imperial objurgation, the short cloaks continued in fashion down to the time of which we treat, and particularly among the princes of the house of Anjou. They were therefore in universal use among Prince John’s courtiers; and the long mantle, which formed the upper garment of the Saxons, was held in proportional derision.

The guests were seated at a table which groaned under the quantity of good cheer. The numerous cooks who attended on the Prince’s progress, having exerted all their art in varying the forms in which the ordinary provisions were served up, had succeeded almost as well as the modern professors of the culinary art in rendering them perfects ke their natural appearance. Besides these dishes of estic origin, there were various delicacies brought from gn parts, and a quantity of rich pastry, as well as of the el bread and wastel cakes, which were only used at ales of the highest nobility. The banquet was ned with the richest wines, both foreign and domestic. ut, though luxurious, the Norman nobles were not rally speaking, an intemperate race. While indulging selves in the pleasures of the table, they aimed at deli but avoided excess, and were apt to attribute gluttony drankness to the vanquished Saxons, as vices peculiar heir inferior station. Prince John, indeed, and those courted his pleasure by imitating his foibles, were apt dule to excess in the pleasures of the trencher and goblet; and indeed it is well known that his death was signed by a surfeit upon peaches and new ale. His uct, however, was an exception to the general manners s countrymen.

With sly gravity, interrupted only by private signs to other, the Norman knights and nobles beheld the ir demeanor of Athelstane and Cedric at a banquet to form and fashion of which they were unaccustomed. While their manners were thus the subject of sarcastic savation, the untaught Saxons unwittingly transgressed a of the arbitrary rules established for the regulation society. Now, it is well known that a man may with impunity be guilty of an actual breach either of real breeding or of good morals, than appear ignorant of most minute point of fashionable etiquette. Thus ic, who dried his hands with a towel, instead of sufferthe moisture to exhaile by waving them gracefully in air, incurred more ridicule than his companion Athelstane, when he swallowed to his own single share the whole

SEMEL BREAD. Made of fine bolted flour. Compare German Semmel.
gastel. From Old French gastel, modern French gateau; cake made t quality of flour.
of a large pasty composed of the most exquisite foreign delicacies, and termed at that time a "karum pie." When, however, it was discovered, by a serious cross-examination, that the thane of Coningsburgh—or franklin, as the Normans termed him—had no idea what he had been devouring, and that he had taken the contents of the "karum pie" for larks and pigeons, whereas they were in fact beccaficoes² and nightingales, his ignorance brought him in for an ample share of the ridicule which would have been more justly bestowed on his gluttony.

The long feast had at length its end; and, while the goblet circulated freely, men talked of the feats of the preceding tournament—of the unknown victor in the archery games, of the Black Knight, whose self-denial had induced him to withdraw from the honours he had won, and of the gallant Ivanhoe, who had so dearly bought the honours of the day. The topics were treated with military frankness, and the jest and laugh went round the hall. The brow of Prince John alone was overclouded during these discussions; some overpowering care seemed agitating his mind, and it was only when he received occasional hints from his attendants that he seemed to take interest in what was passing around him. On such occasions he would start up, quaff a cup of wine as if to raise his spirits, and then mingle in the conversation by some observation made abruptly or at random.

"We drink this beaker," said he, "to the health of Wilfred of Ivanhoe, champion of this passage of arms, and grieve that his wound renders him absent from our board.
Let all fill to the pledge, and especially Cedric of Rotherwood, the worthy father of a son so promising."

"No, my lord," replied Cedric, standing up, and placing on the table his untasted cup, "I yield not the name of son to the disobedient youth who at once despises my com-

² Beccaficoes. "Fig-peckers"; small song-birds resembling nightingales.
and relinquishes the manners and customs of his is impossible,” cried Prince John, with well-feigned ment, “that so gallant a knight should be an un-or disobedient son!”
t, my lord,” answered Cedric, “so it is with this
. He left my homely dwelling to mingle with the ility of your brother’s court, where he learned to do ricks of horsemanship which you prize so highly.
it contrary to my wish and command; and in the Alfred that would have been termed disobedience—
a crime severely punishable.”
as!” replied Prince John, with a deep sigh of sympathy, “since your son was a follower of my brother, it need not be inquired where or from he learned the lesson of filial disobedience.”
spake Prince John, wilfully forgetting that, of all of Henry the Second, though no one was free from rage, he himself had been most distinguished for reand ingratitude to his father.
think,” said he, after a moment’s pause, “that my proposed to confer upon his favourite the rich of Ivanhoe.”
nd did endow him with it,” answered Cedric; “nor is east quarrel with my son that he stooped to hold, as vassal, the very domains which his fathers pos-free and independent right.”
shall then have your willing sanction, good Cedid Prince John, “to confer this fief upon a person ignity will not be diminished by holding land of the crown. Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf,” he said, towards that baron, “I trust you will so keep the barony of Ivanhoe that Sir Wilfred shall not incur ner’s farther displeasure by again entering upon that St. Anthony!” answered the black-browed giant, “ will consent that your Highness shall hold me a Saxon, if either Cedric or Wilfred, or the best that ever bore English blood, shall wrench from me the gift with which your Highness has graced me."

"Whoever shall call thee Saxon, Sir Baron," replied Cedric, offended at a mode of expression by which the Normans frequently expressed their habitual contempt of the English, "will do thee an honour as great as it is undeserved."

Front-de-Bœuf would have replied, but Prince John's petulance and levity got the start.

"Assuredly," said he, "my lords, the noble Cedric speaks truth; and his race may claim precedence over us as much in the length of their pedigrees as in the longitude of their cloaks."

"They go before us indeed in the field, as deer before dogs," said Malvoisin.

"And with good right may they go before us; forget not," said the Prior Aymer, "the superior decency and decorum of their manners."

"Their singular abstemiousness and temperance," said De Bracy, forgetting the plan which promised him a Saxon bride.

"Together with the courage and conduct," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, "by which they distinguished themselves at Hastings and elsewhere."

While, with smooth and smiling cheek, the courtiers, each in turn, followed their Prince's example, and aimed a shaft of ridicule at Cedric, the face of the Saxon became inflamed with passion, and he glanced his eyes fiercely from one to another, as if the quick succession of so many injuries had prevented his replying to them in turn; or, like a baited bull, who, surrounded by his tormentors, is at a loss to choose from among them the immediate object of his revenge. At length he spoke, in a voice half-choaked with passion; and, addressing himself to Prince John as the head of the offence which he had received, "Whatever," have been the follies and vices of our race, a Saxon we have been held niering (the most emphatic term of mean worthlessness) who should in his own hall, and own wine-cup passed, have treated, or suffered to be an unoffending guest as your Highness has this day been used; and whatever was the misfortune of our in the field of Hastings, those may at least be silent (looked at Front-de-Bœuf and the Templar) who, were within these few hours once and again lost saddle up before the lance of a Saxon."

"My faith, a biting jest!" said Prince John. "How it, sirs? Our Saxon subjects rise in spirit and become shrewd in wit and bold in bearing, in these times. What say ye, my lords? By this good bold it best to take our galleys and return to Nor-

"fear of the Saxons?" said De Bracy, laughing, would need no weapon but our hunting spears to drive boars to bay."

"Peace with your raillery, Sir Knights," said Fitzurse; were well," he added, addressing the Prince, "that Highness should assure the worthy Cedric there is no offended him by jests which must sound but harshly of a stranger."

"It!" answered Prince John, resuming his courtesy; "I trust it will not be thought that I could permit any to be offered in my presence. Here! I step to Cedric himself, since he refuses to pledge his health."

Up went round amid the well-dissembled applause untiers, which, however, failed to make the impression on the mind of the Saxon that had been designed. He was not naturally acute of perception, but those too much undervalued his understanding who deemed that this flattering compliment would obliterate the sense of the prior insult. He was silent, however, when the royal pledge again passed round, "To Sir Athelstane of Coningsburgh."

The knight made his obeisance, and showed his sense of the honour by draining a huge goblet in answer to it.

"And now, sirs," said Prince John, who began to be warmed with the wine which he had drank, "having done justice to our Saxon guests, we will pray of them some requital to our courtesy. Worthy thane," he continued, addressing Cedric, "may we pray you to name to us some Norman whose mention may least sully your mouth, and to wash down with a goblet of wine all bitterness which the sound may leave behind it?"

Fitzurse arose while Prince John spoke, and gliding behind the seat of the Saxon, whispered to him not to omit the opportunity of putting an end to unkindness betwixt the two races by naming Prince John. The Saxon replied not to this politic insinuation, but, rising up, and filling his cup to the brim, he addressed Prince John in these words: "Your Highness has required that I should name a Norman deserving to be remembered at our banquet. This, perchance, is a hard task, since it calls on the slave to sing the praises of the master—upon the vanquished, while pressed by all the evils of conquest, to sing the praises of the conqueror. Yet I will name a Norman—the first in arms and in place—the best and the noblest of his race. And the lips that shall refuse to pledge me to his well-earned fame, I term false and dishonoured, and will so maintain them with my life. I quaff this goblet to the health of Richard the Lion-hearted!"

Prince John, who had expected that his own name would have closed the Saxon's speech, started when that of his injured brother was so unexpectedly introduced. He mechanically the wine-cup to his lips, then instantly own, to view the demeanour of the company at this ated proposal, which many of them felt it as unsafe se as to comply with. Some of them, ancient and heed courtiers, closely imitated the example of the himself, raising the goblet to their lips, and again ing it before them. There were many who, with a umerous feeling, exclaimed, “Long live King Rich-d may he be speedily restored to us!” And some ong whom were Front-de-Bœuf and the Templar, disdain suffered their goblets to stand untasted
hem. But no man ventured directly to gainsay a illed to the health of the reigning monarch.
ing enjoyed his triumph for about a minute, Cedric his companion, “Up, noble Athelstane! we have ed here long enough, since we have requited the le courtesy of Prince John’s banquet. Those who know further of our rude Saxon manners must th seek us in the homes of our fathers, since we en enough of royal banquets and enough of Norman saying, he arose and left the banqueting-room, fol-y Athelstane, and by several other guests, who, parof the Saxon lineage, held themselves insulted by sm of Prince John and his courtiers.
the bones of St. Thomas,” said Prince John, as they ed, “the Saxon churls have borne off the best of the have retreated with triumph!”
slamatum est, poculum est,” said Prior Aymer:
e drunk and we have shouted, it were time we left flagons.”
e monk hath some fair penitent to shrive to-night,
is in such a hurry to depart,” said De Bracy.
so, Sir Knight,” replied the Abbot; “but I must veral miles forward this evening upon my home-urney.”
"They are breaking up," said the Prince in a whisper to Fitzurse; "their fears anticipate the event, and this coward Prior is the first to shrink from me."

"Fear not, my lord," said Waldemar; "I will show him such reasons as shall induce him to join us when we hold our meeting at York. "Sir Prior," he said, "I must speak with you in private before you mount your palfrey."

The other guests were now fast dispersing with the exception of those immediately attached to Prince John's faction and his retinue.

"This, then, is the result of your advice," said the Prince, turning an angry countenance upon Fitzurse; "that I should be bearded at my own board by a drunken Saxon churl, and that, on the mere sound of my brother's name, men should fall off from me as if I had the leprosy?"

"Have patience, sir," replied his counsellor; "I might retort your accusation, and blame the inconsiderate levity which foiled my design, and misled your own better judgment. But this is no time for recrimination. De Bracy and I will instantly go among these shuffling cowards and convince them they have gone too far to recede."

"It will be in vain," said Prince John, pacing the apartment with disordered steps, and expressing himself with an agitation to which the wine he had drank partly contributed—"it will be in vain; they have seen the handwriting on the wall—they have marked the paw of the lion in the sand—they have heard his approaching roar shake the wood; nothing will reanimate their courage."

"Would to God," said Fitzurse to De Bracy, "that aught could reanimate his own! His brother's very name is an ague to him. Unhappy are the counsellors of a prince who wants fortitude and perseverance alike in good and evil!"
CHAPTER XV

And yet he thinks—ha, ha, ha, ha—he thinks
I am the tool and servant of his will.
Well, let it be; through all the maze of trouble
His plots and base oppression must create,
I’ll shape myself a way to higher things,
And who will say ’tis wrong?

_Basil, a Tragedy._

No spider ever took more pains to repair the shattered hues of his web than did Waldemar Fitzurse to reunite combine the scattered members of Prince John’s cabal.
ry of these were attached to him from inclination, and k from personal regard. It was therefore necessary Fitzurse should open to them new prospects of advance et, and remind them of those which they at present yzed. To the young and wild nobles he held out the pect of unpunished license and uncontrolled revelry, to mbitious that of power, and to the covetous that of esed wealth and extended domains. The leaders of mercenaries received a donation in gold—an argument ost persuasive to their minds, and without which all ers would have proved in vain. Promises were still liberally distributed than money by this active agent;
, in fine, nothing was left undone that could determine awering or animate the disheartened. The return king Richard he spoke of as an event altogether beyond reach of probability; yet, when he observed, from the btful looks and uncertain answers which he received, this was the apprehension by which the minds of his uplices were most haunted, he boldly treated that event, should it really take place, as one which ought not to alter their political calculations.

"If Richard returns," said Fitzurse, "he returns to enrich his needy and impoverished crusaders at the expense of those who did not follow him to the Holy Land. He returns to call to a fearful reckoning those who, during his absence, have done aught that can be construed offence or encroachment upon either the laws of the land or the privileges of the crown. He returns to avenge upon the Orders of the Temple and the Hospital the preference which they showed to Philip of France during the wars in the Holy Land. He returns, in fine, to punish as a rebel every adherent of his brother Prince John. Are ye afraid of his power?" continued the artful confidant of that Prince; "we acknowledge him a strong and valiant knight; but these are not the days of King Arthur, when a champion could encounter an army. If Richard indeed comes back, it must be alone, unfollowed, unfriended. The bones of his gallant army have whitened the sands of Palestine. The few of his followers who have returned have straggled hither like this Wilfred of Ivanhoe, beggared and broken men. And what talk ye of Richard’s right of birth?” he proceeded, in answer to those who objected scruples on that head. “Is Richard’s title of primogeniture more decidedly certain than that of Duke Robert of Normandy, the Conqueror’s eldest son? And yet William the Red and Henry, his second and third brothers, were successively preferred to him by the voice of the nation. Robert had every merit which can be pleaded for Richard: he was a bold knight, a good leader, generous to his friends and to the church, and, to crown the whole, a crusader and a conqueror of the Holy Sepulchre; and yet he died a blind and miserable prisoner in the Castle of Cardiff, because he opposed himself to the will of the people, who chose that he should not rule over them. It is our right;” he said, “as we choose from the blood royal the prince who is best qualified
Ivanhoe

...hold the supreme power—that is,” said he, correcting himself, “him whose election will best promote the interests to the nobility. In personal qualifications,” he added, “it possible that Prince John might be inferior to his her Richard; but when it was considered that the latter armed with the sword of vengeance in his hand, while former held out rewards, immunities, privileges, wealth, and honours, it could not be doubted which was king whom in wisdom the nobility were called on to port.”

These, and many more arguments, some adapted to the various circumstances of those whom he addressed, had expected weight with the nobles of Prince John’s fac-

. Most of them consented to attend the proposed

ing at York, for the purpose of making general arrangements for placing the crown upon the head of Prince John.

It was late at night when, worn out and exhausted with various exertions, however gratified with the result, urse, returning to the Castle of Ashby, met with De cy, who had exchanged his banqueting garments for a green kirtle, with hose of the same cloth and colour, aathern cap or headpiece, a short sword, a horn slung his shoulder, a long-bow in his hand, and a bundle of rows stuck in his belt. Had Fitzurse met this figure in outer apartment, he would have passed him without ice, as one of the yeomen of the guard; but finding him inner hall, he looked at him with more attention, and igned the Norman knight in the dress of an English man.

“What mummery is this, De Bracy?” said Fitzurse,

what angrily; “is this a time for Christmas gambols quaint maskings, when the fate of our master, Princ n, is on the very verge of decision? Why hast thou not like me, among these heartless cravens whom the very attle. Here, a doublet.

name of King Richard terrifies, as it is said to do the children of the Saracens?"

"I have been attending to mine own business," answered De Bracy, calmly, "as you, Fitzurse, have been minding yours."

"In minding mine own business!" echoed Waldemar; "I have been engaged in that of Prince John, our joint patron."

"As if thou hadst any other reason for that, Waldemar," said De Bracy, "than the promotion of thine own individual interest! Come, Fitzurse, we know each other: ambition is thy pursuit, pleasure is mine, and they become our different ages. Of Prince John thou thinkest as I do—that he is too weak to be a determined monarch, too tyrannical to be an easy monarch, too insolent and presumptuous to be a popular monarch, and too fickle and timid to be long a monarch of any kind. But he is a monarch by whom Fitzurse and De Bracy hope to rise and thrive; and therefore you aid him with your policy, and I with the lances of my Free Companions."

"A hopeful auxiliary," said Fitzurse, impatiently, "playing the fool in the very moment of utter necessity. What on earth dost thou purpose by this absurd disguise at a moment so urgent?"

"To get me a wife," answered De Bracy, coolly, "after the manner of the tribe of Benjamin."1

"The tribe of Benjamin!" said Fitzurse. "I comprehend thee not."

"Wert thou not in presence yestereven," said De Bracy, "when we heard the Prior Aymer tell us a tale in reply to the romance which was sung by the minstrel? He told how, long since in Palestine, a deadly feud arose between the tribe of Benjamin and the rest of the Israelitish nation; and how they cut to pieces well-nigh all the chivalry of that tribe; and how they swore by our blessed Lady that they

1 After the Manner, etc. See Judges XXI.
not permit those who remained to marry in their lace; and how they became grieved for their vow, and to consult his holiness the Pope how they might be ved from it; and how, by the advice of the Holy r, the youth of the tribe of Benjamin carried off from
b tournament all the ladies who were there present, us won them wives without the consent either of brides or their brides’ families.”
have heard the story,” said Fitzurse, “though either rior or thou hast made some singular alterations in and circumstances.”
 tell thee,” said De Bracy, “that I mean to purvey me after the fashion of the tribe of Benjamin; which is ch as to say, that in this same equipment I will fall that herd of Saxon bullocks who have this night left astle, and carry off from them the lovely Rowena.”
art thou mad, De Bracy?” said Fitzurse. “Bethink that, though the men be Saxons, they are rich and ful, and regarded with the more respect by their ymen that wealth and honour are but the lot of few on descent.”
should belong to none,” said De Bracy; “the work Conquest should be completed.”
This is no time for it at least,” said Fitzurse; “the aching crisis renders the favour of the multitude ensible, and Prince John cannot refuse justice to who injures their favourites.”
let him grant it if he dare,” said De Bracy; “he will see the difference betwixt the support of such a lusty spears as mine and that of a heartless mob of Saxon Yet I mean no immediate discovery of myself.
 not in this garb as bold a forester as ever blew horn?
name of the violence shall rest with the outlaws of the ire forests. I have sure spies on the Saxons’
s. To-night they sleep in the convent of St. Wix-tol, or Withold, or whatever they call that churl of a Saint, at Burton-on-Trent. Next day's march brings the lady within our reach, and, falcon-ways, we swoop on them once. Presently after I will appear in mine own shape, play the courteous knight, rescue the unfortunate afflicted fair one from the hands of the rude ravishers, conduct her to Front-de-Bœuf's castle, or to Normandy, if it should be necessary, and produce her not again to her husband until she be the bride and dame of Maurice de Bracy.

"A marvellously sage plan," said Fitzurse, "and, as I think, not entirely of thine own device. Come, be frank. De Bracy, who aided thee in the invention? and who is to assist in the execution? for, as I think, thine own band is as far off as York."

"Marry, if thou must needs know," said De Bracy, "it was the Templar Brian de Bois-Guilbert that shaped the enterprise, which the adventure of the men of Benjamin suggested to me. He is to aid me in the onslaught and he and his followers will personate the outlaws, from whom my valorous arm is, after changing my garb, to rescue the lady."

"By my halidome," said Fitzurse, "the plan was worth of your united wisdom! and thy prudence, De Bracy, most especially manifested in the project of leaving the lady in the hands of thy worthy confederate. Thou mayest I think, succeed in taking her from her Saxon friends, how thou wilt rescue her afterwards from the clutches of de Bois-Guilbert seems considerably more doubtful. He is a falcon well accustomed to pounce on a partridge and to let his prey fast."

"He is a Templar," said De Bracy, "and cannot therefore rival me in my plan of wedding this heiress; and I attempt aught dishonourable against the intended bride.

1 Wittol. A Saxon word meaning "fool"; in thus punning upon the name of St. Withold (see note, page 49), De Bracy aims an irreverent jest at the Saxons.
By heaven! were he a whole chapter of his order single person, he dared not do me such an injury!" then, since nought that I can say," said Fitzurse, "will it be folly from thy imagination, for well I know the of thy disposition, at least waste as little time as ; let not thy folly be lasting as well as untimely." all thee," answered De Bracy, "that it will be the a few hours, and I shall be at York at the head of ng and valorous fellows, as ready to support any sign as thy policy can be to form one. But I hear grades assembling, and the steeds stamping an g in the outer court. Farewell. I go, like a true to win the smiles of beauty."

be a true knight!" repeated Fitzurse, looking after like a fool, I should say, or like a child, who will the most serious and needful occupation to chase the the thistle that drives past him. But it is with s that I must work—and for whose advantage? of a Prince as unwise as he is profligate, and as be an ungrateful master as he has already provedious son and an unnatural brother. But he—he unt one of the tools with which I labour; and, proud, should he presume to separate his interest from is is a secret which he shall soon learn."

meditations of the statesman were here interrupted voice of the Prince from an interior apartment call- "Noble Waldemar Fitzurse!" and, with bonnet he future Chancellor, for to such high preferment wily Norman aspire, hastened to receive the orders future sovereign.
CHAPTER XVI

Far in a wild, unknown to public view,
From youth to age a reverend hermit grew;
The moss his bed, the cave his humble cell,
His food the fruits, his drink the crystal well;
Remote from man, with God he pass'd his days,
Prayer all his business all his pleasure praise.

PARNELL.

The reader cannot have forgotten that the event of the tournament was decided by the exertions of an unknown knight, whom, on account of the passive and indifferent conduct which he had manifested on the former part of the day, the spectators had entitled Le Noir Faineant. This knight had left the field abruptly when the victory was achieved; and when he was called upon to receive the reward of his valour he was nowhere to be found. In the mean time, while summoned by heralds and by trumpets, the knight was holding his course northward, avoiding all frequented paths, and taking the shortest road through the woodlands. He paused for the night at a small hostel, lying out of the ordinary route, where, however, he obtained from a wandering minstrel news of the event of the tourney.

On the next morning the knight departed early, with the intention of making a long journey; the condition of his horse, which he had carefully spared during the preceding morning, being such as enabled him to travel far without the necessity of much repose. Yet his purpose was baffled by the devious paths through which he rode, so that when evening closed upon him he only found himself on the frontiers of the West Riding of Yorkshire. By this journey under a rider cased in mail, had no sooner found, by the slackened reins, that he was abandoned to his own guidance, than he seemed to assume new strength and spirit; and whereas formerly he had scarce replied to the spur otherwise than by a groan, he now, as if proud of the confidence reposed in him, pricked up his ears, and assumed, of his own accord, a more lively motion. The path which the animal adopted rather turned off from the course pursued by the knight during the day; but as the horse seemed confident in his choice, the rider abandoned himself to his discretion.
The good steed, grievously fatigued with so long a day's

He was justified by the event, for the footpath soon after appeared a little wider and more worn, and the tinkle of a small bell gave the knight to understand that he was in the vicinity of some chapel or hermitage.

Accordingly, he soon reached an open plat of turf, on the opposite side of which a rock, rising abruptly from a gently sloping plain, offered its grey and weatherbeaten front to the traveller. Ivy mantled its sides in some places, and in others oaks and holly bushes, whose roots found nourishment in the cliffs of the crag, waved over the precipices below, like the plumage of the warrior over his steel helmet, giving grace to that whose chief expression was terror. At the bottom of the rock, and leaning, as it were, against it, was constructed a rude hut, built chiefly of the trunks of trees felled in the neighbouring forest, and secured against the weather by having its crevices stuffed with moss mingled with clay. The stem of a young fir-tree lopped of its branches, with a piece of wood tied across near the top, was planted upright by the door, as a rude emblem of the holy cross. At a little distance on the right hand, a fountain of the purest water trickled out of the rock, and was received in a hollow stone, which labour had formed into a rustic basin. Escaping from thence, the stream murmured down the descent by a channel which its course and long worn, and so wandered through the little plain to se itself in the neighbouring wood.

Beside this fountain were the ruins of a very small capel, of which the roof had partly fallen in. The building, when entire, had never been above sixteen feet long by twelve feet in breadth, and the roof, low in proportion, rested upon four concentric arches which sprung from the four corners of the building, each supported upon a short and heavy pillar. The ribs of two of these arches remained, though the roof had fallen down betwixt them; over the others it remained entire. The entrance to this ancient place of devotion was under a very low round arch, ornamented by several courses of that zig-zag moulding, resembling sharks' teeth, which appears so often in the more ancient Saxon architecture. A belfry rose above the arch on four small pillars, within which hung the green and weatherbeaten bell, the feeble sounds of which had seen some time before heard by the Black Knight.

The whole peaceful and quiet scene lay glimmering in wilight before the eyes of the traveller, giving him good assurance of lodging for the night; since it was a special duty of those hermits who dwelt in the woods to exercise hospitality towards benighted or bewildered passengers.

Accordingly, the knight took no time to consider minutely the particulars which we have detailed, but thanking St. Julian,¹ the patron of travellers, who had sent him good harbourage, he leaped from his horse and assailed the door of the hermitage with the butt of his lance, in order to arouse attention and gain admittance.

It was some time before he obtained any answer, and to reply, when made, was unpropitious.

¹ St. JULIAN. Compare the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, ii. 340-354, which Chaucer describes the Franklin thus:

"An householder, and that a great, was he;
Saint Julian he was in his countrie.

His table dormant (permanent) in his hall alway Stood ready covered all the live-long day."
“Pass on, whosoever thou art,” was the answer given by a deep hoarse voice from within the hut, “and disturb not the servant of God and St. Dunstan in his evening devotions.”

“Worthy father,” answered the knight, “here is a poor wanderer bewildered in these woods, who gives thee the opportunity of exercising thy charity and hospitality.”

“Good brother,” replied the inhabitant of the hermitage, “it has pleased Our Lady and St. Dunstan to destine me for the object of those virtues, instead of the exercise thereof. I have no provisions here which even a dog would share with me, and a horse of any tenderness of nurture would despise my couch; pass therefore on thy way, and God speed thee.”

“But how,” replied the knight, “is it possible for me to find my way through such a wood as this, when darkness is coming on? I pray you, reverend father, as you are a Christian, to undo your door, and at least point out to me my road.”

“And I pray you, good Christian brother,” replied the anchorite, “to disturb me no more. You have already interrupted one pater, two aves, and a credo, which I, miserable sinner that I am, should, according to my vow, have said before moonrise.”

“The road—the road!” vociferated the knight; “give me directions for the road, if I am to expect no more from thee.”

“The road,” replied the hermit, “is easy to hit. The path from the wood leads to a morass, and from thence to ford, which, as the rains have abated, may now be passable. When thou hast crossed the ford, thou wilt take care of the footing up the left bank, as it is somewhat precipitous, and the path, which hangs over the river, has lately, as I learn—for I seldom leave the duties of my chapel—given way in sundry places. Thou wilt then keep straight forward—

1 Pater, etc. See note, page 98.
"A broken path—a precipice—a ford—and a morass!" the knight, interrupting him. "Sir Hermit, if you be the holiest that ever wore beard or told bead, you shall not prevail on me to hold this road to-night. I tell thee, that thou, who livest by the charity of the country—deserved as I doubt it is—hast no right to refuse shelter the wayfarer when in distress. Either open the door quickly, or, by the rood, I will beat it down and make entry myself."

"Friend wayfarer," replied the hermit, "be not importune; if thou puttest me to use the carnal weapon in mine defence, it will be e'en the worse for you."

At this moment a distant noise of barking and growling, whch the traveller had for some time heard, became exremely loud and furious, and made the knight suppose that the hermit, alarmed by his threat of making forcible entry, called the dogs, who made this clamour to aid him in defence, out of some inner recess in which they had been chained. Incensed at this preparation on the hermit's part for making good his inhospitable purpose, the knight struck the door so furiously with his foot that posts as well staples shook with violence.

The anchorite, not caring again to expose his door to a similar shock, now called out aloud: "Patience—patience; use thy strength, good traveller, and I will presently undo the door, though, it may be, my doing so will be little to thyasure."

The door accordingly was opened; and the hermit, a strong-built man, in his sackcloth gown and hood, with a rope of rushes, stood before the knight. He had one hand a lighted torch, or link, and in the other a long of crab-tree, so thick and heavy that it might well be used a club. Two large shaggy dogs, half greyhound, half mastiff, stood ready to rush upon the traveller as soon... as the door should be opened. But when the torch glared upon the lofty crest and golden spurs of the knight, who stood without, the hermit, altering probably his original intentions, repressed the rage of his auxiliaries, and, changing his tone to a sort of churlish courtesy, invited the knight to enter his hut, making excuse for his unwillingness to open his lodge after sunset by alleging the multitude of robbers and outlaws who were abroad, and who gave honour to Our Lady or St. Dunstan, nor to those holy men who spent life in their service.

"The poverty of your cell, good father," said the knight, looking around him, and seeing nothing but a bed of straw, a crucifix rudely carved in oak, a missal, with a rough hewn table and two stools, and one or two clumsy articles of furniture—"the poverty of your cell should seem sufficient defence against any risk of thieves, not to mention the aid of two trusty dogs, large and strong enough to think, to pull down a stag, and, of course, to match with most men."

"The good keeper of the forest," said the hermit, "allowed me the use of these animals to protect my solitude until the times shall mend."

Having said this, he fixed his torch in a twisted brazier of iron which served for a candlestick; and placing an oaken trivet before the embers of the fire, which was freshed with some dry wood, he placed a stool upon one of the table, and beckoned to the knight to do the same upon the other.

They sat down, and gazed with great gravity at each other, each thinking in his heart that he had seldom seen a stronger or more athletic figure than was placed opposite to him.

"Reverend hermit," said the knight, after looking... at his host, "were it not to interrupt your devout,

I would pray to know three things of your host, where I am to put my horse? secondly, what for supper? thirdly, where I am to take up my bed at night?"

"Reply to you," said the hermit, "with my finger, against my rule to speak by words where signs can serve you." So saying, he pointed successively towards the hut. "Your stable," said he, "is bed there; and," reaching down a platter with grains of parched pease upon it from the neighbour-and placing it upon the table, he added, "your

ere."

Knight shrugged his shoulders, and leaving the hut,

his horse, which in the interim he had fastened and saddled him with much attention, and spread spread his weary back his own mantle.

hermit was apparently somewhat moved to com-

the anxiety as well as address which the stranger tending his horse; for, muttering something ender left for the keeper’s palfrey, he dragged bess a bundle of forage, which he spread before

’s charger, and immediately afterwards shook ensity of dried fern in the corner which he had the rider’s couch. The knight returned him his courtesy; and, this duty done, both resumed

by the table, whereon stood the trencher of pease between them. The hermit, after a long grace, once been Latin, but of which original language remained, excepting here and there the long omination of some word or phrase, set example to modestly putting into a very large mouth, fur-teeth which might have ranked with those of a in sharpness and whiteness, some three or four

, a miserable grist, as it seemed, for so large and
The knight, in order to follow so laudable an example laid aside his helmet, his corselet, and the greater part of his armour, and showed to the hermit a head thick-clothed with yellow hair, high features, blue eyes, remarkably bright and sparkling, a mouth well formed, having an upper lip clothed with mustachios darker than his hair, and bearing altogether the look of a bold, daring, and surprising man, with which his strong form well corresponded.

The hermit, as if wishing to answer to the confidence of his guest, threw back his cowl, and showed a round but shaven head belonging to a man in the prime of life. His coif, a crown, surrounded by a circle of stiff curled black hair, had something the appearance of a parish pin, begirt by its high beaver. The features expressed not of monastic austerity or of ascetic privations; on the contrary, it was a bold bluff countenance, with broad black brows, a well-turned forehead, and cheeks as round and vermilion as those of a trumpeter, from which descended long and curly black beard. Such a visage, joined to a brawny form of the holy man, spoke rather of sirloins and haunches than of pease and pulse. This incongruity not escape the guest. After he had with great difficulty accomplished the mastication of a mouthful of the dry pease, he found it absolutely necessary to request his entertainer to furnish him with some liquor; who replied to his request by placing before him a large can of purest water from the fountain.

"It is from the well of St. Dunstan," said he, "in which betwixt sun and sun, he baptised five hundred heathen Danes and Britons—blessed be his name!" And applied his black beard to the pitcher, he took a draught much more moderate in quantity than his encomium seemed to warrant.

"It seems to me, reverend father," said the knight.

---

1. Corselet. Body-armour; from Latin corpus, body.
2. Pinfold. A pen for stray cattle; a pound.
at the small morsels which you eat, together with this but somewhat thin beverage, have thriven with you wellously. You appear a man more fit to win the ram wrestling-match, or the ring at a bout at quarter-staff, the bucklers at a sword-play, than to linger out your life in this desolate wilderness, saying masses, and living on parched pease and cold water.”

“Sir Knight,” answered the hermit, “your thoughts, those of the ignorant laity, are according to the flesh.
As pleased Our Lady and my patron saint to bless the ancestors to which I restrain myself, even as the pulse and blessed to the children Shadrach, Meshech, and longo, who drank the same rather than defile them-thes with the wine and meats which were appointed them by the King of the Saracens.”

“Holy father,” said the knight, “upon whose counte-ce it hath pleased Heaven to work such a miracle, permit ful layman to crave thy name?”

“Thou mayst call me,” answered the hermit, “the Clerk Copmanhurst, for so I am termed in these parts. They it is true, the epithet holy, but I stand not upon that, being unworthy of such addition. And now, valiant right, may I pray ye for the name of my honourable it?”

“Truly,” said the knight, “Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst, call me in these parts the Black Knight; many, sir, add the epithet of Sluggard, whereby I am no way ambious to be distinguished.”

The hermit could scarcely forbear from smiling at his it’s reply.

“I see,” said he, “Sir Sluggish Knight, that thou art a

---

1 Win the Ram. The conventional prizes in village contests are here 2 King of the Saracens. During the middle ages it was customary for 3 Clerk. An educated man, particularly a priest; from Latin clericus, a 4, whence also our words clerical and clergy.
man of prudence and of counsel; and, moreover, I see that my poor monastic fare likes thee not, accustomed, perhaps, as thou hast been to the license of courts and of camps, and the luxuries of cities; and now I bethink me, Sir Sluggard, that when the charitable keeper of this forest-walk left these dogs for my protection, and also those bundles of forage, he left me also some food, which, being unfit for my use, the very recollection of it had escaped me amid my more weighty meditations.”

“I dare be sworn he did so,” said the knight; “I was convinced that there was better food in the cell, Holy Clerk, since you first doffed your cowl. Your keeper is ever a jovial fellow; and none who beheld thy grinders contending with these pease, and thy throat flooded with this ungenial element, could see thee doomed to such horse-provender and horse-beverage (pointing to the provisions upon the table), and refrain from mending thy cheer. Let us see the keeper’s bounty, therefore, without delay.”

The hermit cast a wistful look upon the knight, in which there was a sort of comic expression of hesitation, as if uncertain how far he should act prudently in trusting his guest. There was, however, as much of bold frankness in the knight’s countenance as was possible to be expressed by features. His smile, too, had something in it irresistibly comic, and gave an assurance of faith and loyalty, with which his host could not refrain from sympathising.

After exchanging a mute glance or two, the hermit went to the further side of the hut, and opened a hutch,¹ which was concealed with great care and some ingenuity. Out of the recesses of a dark closet, into which this aperture gave admittance, he brought a large pasty, baked in a pewter platter of unusual dimensions. This mighty dish he placed before his guest, who, using his poniard to cut it open, lost no time in making himself acquainted with its contents.

“How long is it since the good keeper has been here?”

¹Hutch. A chest or bin.
The knight to his host, after having swallowed several morsels of this reinforcement to the hermit's good humor.

"About two months," answered the father, hastily.

"By the true Lord," answered the knight, "everything your hermitage is miraculous, Holy Clerk! for I would have been sworn that the fat buck which furnished this venison had been running on foot within the week."

The hermit was somewhat discountenanced by this obser-vation; and, moreover, he made but a poor figure while on the diminution of the pasty on which his guest was making desperate inroads—a warfare in which his previous profession of abstinence left him no pretext for shying.

"I have been in Palestine, Sir Clerk," said the knight, "and I bethink me it is a custom there that every host who entertains a guest shall assure of the wholesomeness of his food by partaking of it with him. Far be it from me to suspect so holy a man of aught inhospitable; nevertheless, I will be highly ind to you would you comply with this Eastern custom."

"To ease your unnecessary scruples, Sir Knight, I will once depart from my rule," replied the hermit. And as there were no forks in those days, his clutches were instantly in the bowels of the pasty.

The ice of ceremony being once broken, it seemed matter of rivalry between the guest and the entertainer which could display the best appetite; and although the former probably fasted longest, yet the hermit fairly surpassed.

"Holy Clerk," said the knight, when his hunger was eased, "I would gage my good horse yonder against a thin, that that same honest keeper to whom we are pledged for the venison has left thee a stoup of wine, or a flet of canary, or some such trifle, by way of ally to this.

Canary. Wine from the Canary Islands.
noble pasty. This would be a circumstance, doubtless, totally unworthy to dwell in the memory of so rigid an anchorite; yet, I think, were you to search yonder crypt once more, you would find that I am right in my conjecture."

The hermit only replied by a grin; and returning to the hutch, he produced a leathern bottle, which might contain about four quarts. He also brought forth two large drinking cups, made out of the horn of the urus, and hooped with silver. Having made this goodly provision for washing down the supper, he seemed to think no farther ceremonious scruple necessary on his part; but filling both cups, and saying, in the Saxon fashion, "Waes hail, Sir Sluggish Knight!" he emptied his own at a draught.

"Drinc hael, Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst!" answered the warrior, and did his host reason in a similar brimmer.

"Holy Clerk," said the stranger, after the first cup was thus swallowed, "I cannot but marvel that a man possessed of such thews and sinews as thine, and who therewithal shows the talent of so goodly a trencherman, should think of abiding by himself in this wilderness. In my judgment, you are fitter to keep a castle or a fort, eating of the fat and drinking of the strong, than to live here upon pulse and water, or even upon the charity of the keeper. At least, were I as thou, I should find myself both disport and plenty out of the king's deer. There is many a goodly herd in these forests, and a buck will never be missed that goes to the use of St. Dunstan's chaplain."

"Sir Sluggish Knight," replied the Clerk, "these are dangerous words, and I pray you to forbear them. I am true hermit to the king and law, and were I to spoil my liege's game, I should be sure of the prison, and, an my gown saved me not, were in some peril of hanging."

1 Urus. An animal like the buffalo, now extinct.
2 As "the benefit of clergy," a provision of the law which removed lives of the church from the jurisdiction of the secular courts.
“Nevertheless, were I as thou,” said the knight, “I could take my walk by moonlight, when foresters and keepers were warm in bed, and ever and anon—as I pattered my prayers—I would let fly a shaft among the herds of dunner that feed in the glades. Resolve me, Holy Clerk, hast thou never practised such a pastime?”

“Friend Sluggard,” answered the hermit, “thou hast swung all that can concern thee of my housekeeping, and something more than he deserves who takes up his quarters by violence. Credit me, it is better to enjoy the good which God sends thee, than to be impertinently curious how it comes. Fill thy cup, and welcome; and do not, I say thee, by further impertinent inquiries, put me to show that thou couldst hardly have made good thy lodging had I been earnest to oppose thee.”

“By my faith,” said the knight, “thou makest me more serious than ever! Thou art the most mysterious hermit I ever met; and I will know more of thee ere we part. As for thy threats, know, holy man, thou speakest to one whose eyes it is to find out danger wherever it is to be met with.”

“Sir Sluggish Knight, I drink to thee,” said the hermit, respecting thy valour much, but deeming wondrous lightly of thy discretion. If thou wilt take equal arms with me, I will give thee, in all friendship and brotherly love, such sufficing penance and complete absolution that thou shalt not for the next twelve months sin the sin of excess of curiosity.”

The knight pledged him, and desired him to name his apons.

“There is none,” replied the hermit, “from the scissors Delilah,¹ and the tenpenny nail of Jael to the scimitar of Goliath, at which I am not a match for thee. But, if I am make the election, what sayst thou, good friend, to these minkets?”

Thus speaking, he opened another hutch, and took out

¹ Delilah, etc. See Judges XVI, 4; IV, 17; I. Samuel, XVII.
from it a couple of broadswords and bucklers, such as were used by the yeomanry of the period. The knight, who watched his motions, observed that this second place of concealment was furnished with two or three good long-bows, a cross-bow, a bundle of bolts for the latter, and half a dozen sheaves of arrows for the former. A harp, and other matters of a very uncanonical appearance, were also visible when this dark recess was opened.

"I promise thee, brother Clerk," said he, "I will ask thee no more offensive questions. The contents of that cupboard are an answer to all my inquiries; and I see a weapon there (here he stooped and took out the harp) on which I would more gladly prove my skill with thee than at the sword and buckler."

"I hope, Sir Knight," said the hermit, "thou hast given no good reason for thy surname of the Sluggard. I do promise thee, I suspect thee grievously. Nevertheless, thou art my guest, and I will not put thy manhood to the proof without thine own free will. Sit thee down, then, and fill thy cup; let us drink, sing, and be merry. If thou knowest ever a good lay, thou shalt be welcome to a nook of pasty at Copmanhurst so long as I serve the chapel of St. Dunstan, which, please God, shall be till I change my grey covering for one of green turf. But come, fill a flagon, for it will crave some time to tune the harp; and nought pitches the voice and sharpens the ear like a cup of wine. For my part, I love to feel the grape at my very finger-ends before they make the harp-strings tinkle."

1 Nook. A piece.

2 The Jolly Hermit. All readers, however slightly acquainted with black letter (the old English alphabet character, in which these traditions are preserved), must recognize in the Clerk of Copmanhurst, Friar Tuck, the burly Confessor of Robin Hood’s gang, the Curtal Friar of Fountain’s Abbey. [Scott.]
CHAPTER XVII

At eve, within yon studious nook,
I ope my brass-embossed book,
Portray'd with many a holy deed
Of martyrs crown'd with heavenly meed;
Then, as my taper waxes dim,
Chant, ere I sleep, my measured hymn.

Who but would cast his pomp away,
To take my staff and amice grey,
And to the world's tumultuous stage,
Prefer the peaceful Hermitage?

Warton.

...withstanding the prescription of the genial hermit, which his guest willingly complied, he found it no matter to bring the harp to harmony.

"Peradventure, holy father," said he, "the instrument wanting, and the rest have been somewhat misused."

"Heavenly wine, mark'st thou that?" replied the hermit; "that which is a master of the craft. Wine and wassail," he said, "casting up his eyes—"all the fault of wine! I told Allan-a-Dale, the northern minstrel, to beware of the harp if he touched it after the cup, but he would not be controlled. Friend, I shall not thy successful performance."

"Thy saying, he took off his cup with much gravity, at the same time shaking his head at the intemperance of the northern harper.

The knight, in the mean time, had brought the strings some order, and, after a short prelude, asked his host if he would choose a sirventé in the language of.oc, etc. See Appendix, note C. [Scott.]" or a lai in the language of oui, or a virelai, or a ballad in the vulgar English.

"A ballad—a ballad," said the hermit, "against all the ocs and ouis of France. Downright English am I, Sir Knight, and downright English was my patron St. Dunstan, and scorned oc and out, as he would have scorned the parings of the devil's hoof; downright English alone shall be sung in this cell."

"I will assay, then," said the knight, "a ballad composed by a Saxon gleeman, whom I knew in Holy Land."

It speedily appeared that, if the knight was not a complete master of the minstrel art, his taste for it had at least been cultivated under the best instructors. Art had taught him to soften the faults of a voice which had little compass, and was naturally rough rather than mellow, and, in short, had done all that culture can do in supplying natural deficiencies. His performance, therefore, might have been termed very respectable by abler judges than the hermit, especially as the knight threw into the notes now a degree of spirit, and now of plaintive enthusiasm, which gave force and energy to the verses which he sung.

THE CRUSADER'S RETURN.

High deeds achieved of knightly fame,
From Palestine the champion came;
The cross upon his shoulders borne
Battle and blast had dimm'd and torn.
Each dint upon his batter'd shield
Was token of a foughten field;
And thus, beneath his lady's bower,
He sung, as fell the twilight hour:

"Joy to the fair!—thy knight behold,*
Return'd from yonder land of gold.
No wealth he brings, nor wealth can need
Save his good arms and battle-steed,
His spurs, to dash against a toe,
His lance and sword to lay him low;
Such all the trophies of his toil,
*Such—and the hope of Tekla's smile!"
"Joy to the fair! whose constant knight
Her favour fired to feats of might;
Unnoted shall she not remain,
Where meet the bright and noble train;
Minstrel shall sing and herald tell:
'Mark yonder maid of beauty well,
'Tis she for whose bright eyes was won
The listed field at Askalon!

"'Note well her smile! it edged the blade
Which fifty wives to widows made,
When, vain his strength and Mahound's spell,
Iconium's turban'd Soldan fell.
Seest thou her locks, whose sunny glow
Half shows, half shades, her neck of snow?
Twines not of them one golden thread,
But for its sake a Paynim bled.'

"'Joy to the fair!—my name unknown,
Each deed and all its praise thine own;
Then, oh! unbar this churlish gate,
The night dew falls, the hour is late.
Inured to Syria's glowing breath,
I feel the north breeze chill as death;
Let grateful love quell maiden shame
And grant him bliss who brings thee fame."

During this performance, the hermit demeaned himself like a first-rate critic of the present day at a new.

He reclined back upon his seat with his eyes half now folding his hands and twisting his thumbs, he absorbed in attention, and anon, balancing his ex- palms, he gently flourished them in time to the . At one or two favourite cadences he threw in a assistance of his own, where the knight's voice seemed to carry the air so high as his worshipful taste ap- . When the song was ended, the anchorite em- tally declared it a good one, and well sung.

and yet," said he, "I think my Saxon countrymen had long enough with the Normans to fall into the tone ir melancholy ditties. What took the honest knight a one? or what could he expect but to find his mistres engaged with a rival on his return, and his se enade, as they call it, as little regarded as the caterwauling of a cat in the gutter? Nevertheless, Sir Knight, I drink this cup to thee, to the success of all true lovers. I fear you are none," he added, on observing that the knight, whose brain began to be heated with these repeated draughts, qualified his flagon from the water pitcher.

"Why," said the knight, "did you not tell me that this water was from the well of your blessed patron, St. Dunstan?"

"Ay, truly," said the hermit, "and many a hundred of pagans did he baptize there, but I never heard that he drank any of it. Everything should be put to its proper use in this world. St. Dunstan knew, as well as any one, the prerogatives of a jovial friar."

And so saying, he reached the harp and entertained his guest with the following characteristic song, to a sort of derry-down\(^1\) chorus, appropriate to an old English ditty:

THE BAREFOOTED FRIAR.

I'll give thee, good fellow, a twelvemonth or twain,
To search Europe through, from Byzantium to Spain;
But ne'er shall you find, should you search till you tire,
So happy a man as the Barefooted Friar.

Your knight for his lady pricks forth in career,
And is brought home at evensong prickt through with a spear;
I confess him in haste—for his lady desires
No comfort on earth save the Barefooted Friar's.

Your monarch! Pshaw! many a prince has been known
To barter his robes for our cowl and our gown;
But which of us e'er felt the idle desire
To exchange for a crown the grey hood of a Friar!

The Friar has walk'd out, and where'er he has gone,
The land and its fatness is mark'd for his own;
He can roam where he lists, he can stop when he tires,
For every man's house is the Barefooted Friar's.

\(^1\) DERRY-DOWN. It may be proper to remind the reader, that the chorus of "derry-down" is supposed to be as ancient, not only as the times of the Heptarchy, but as those of the Druids, and to have furnished the chorus to the hymns of those venerable persons when they went to the wood to gather mistletoe. [Scott.] expected at noon, and no wight till he comes in the great chair, or the porridge of plums;
best of the cheer, and the seat by the fire,
the denied right of the Barefooted Friar.

expected at night, and the pasty's made hot,
coach the brown ale, and they fill the black pot,
so goodwife would wish the goodman in the mire ack'd a soft pillow, the Barefooted Friar.

purish the sandal, the cord, and the cope,
adv of the devil and trust of the Pope;
gather life's roses, unscathed by the briar ed alone to the Barefooted Friar.

my troth,” said the knight, “thou hast sung well ly, and in high praise of thine order. And, talkde, Holy Clerk, are you not afraid that he may visit during some of your uncanonical pastimes?”
uncanical!” answered the hermit; “I scorn the I scorn it with my heels! I serve the duty of my uly and truly. Two masses daily, morning and primes,1 noons, and vespers, aves, credos, pat-cepting moonlight nights, when the venison is in said his guest.

ceptis excipiendis,”2 replied the hermit, “as our old ught me to say, when impertinent laymen should I kept every punctilio of mine order.”

,e, holy father,” said the knight; “but the devil is ep an eye on such exceptions; he goes about, thou like a roaring lion.”

him roar here if he dares,” said the Friar; “a touch
ord will make him roar as loud as the tongs3 of St.
himself did. I never feared man, and I as little

1. From Latin primus, first; the first canonical hour for reciting n the breviary; about daybreak, following matin, the appointed orning hour, while “noons” and “vespers” indicate respec-
day and the evening exercises.

2. excipiendis. Exceptions excepted.

3. St. Dunstan, tempted at his forge, is said to have seized the devil's ose.
fear the devil and his imps. St. Dunstan, St. Dubric, St. Winibald, St. Winifred, St. Swibert, St. Willick, not forgetting St. Thomas of Kent and my own poor merits to speed,—I defy every devil of them, come cut and long tail. But to let you into a secret, I never speak upon such subjects, my friend, until after morning vespers.

He changed the conversation: fast and furious grew the mirth of the parties, and many a song was exchanged betwixt them, when their revels were interrupted by a loud knocking at the door of the hermitage.

The occasion of this interruption we can only explain by resuming the adventures of another set of our character; for, like old Ariosto, we do not pique ourselves upon continuing uniformly to keep company with any one personage of our drama.

1 Vespers. Even-song. How does the friar happen to make the mistake?

2 Ariosto. An Italian poet, who like Scott, made use of heroic and romantic themes. Scott was sometimes called the "Ariosto of the North."
CHAPTER XVIII

Away! our journey lies through dell and dingle,
Where the blithe fawn trips by its timid mother,
Where the broad oak, with intercepting boughs,
Chequers the sunbeam in the greensward alley—
Up and away! for lovely paths are these
To tread, when the glad Sun is on his throne;
Less pleasant, and less safe, when Cynthia’s lamp
With doubtful glimmer lights the dreary forest.

_Ettrick Forest._

When Cedric the Saxon saw his son drop down senseless he lists at Ashby, his first impulse was to order him into custody and care of his own attendants; but the words were stilled in his throat. He could not bring himself to know what to say in presence of such an assembly, the son in whom he had renounced and disinherited. He ordered, ever, Oswald to keep an eye upon him; and directed an officer, with two of his serfs, to convey Ivanhoe to ajoy as soon as the crowd had dispersed. Oswald, however, was anticipated in this good office. The crowd dis-dissolved, indeed, but the knight was nowhere to be seen.

It was in vain that Cedric’s cupbearer looked around for a young master: he saw the bloody spot on which he had sunk down, but himself he saw no longer; it seemed as if the fairies had conveyed him from the spot. Perhaps perhaps—the Saxons were very superstitious—might have adopted some such hypothesis to account for Ivanhoe’s appearance, had he not suddenly cast his eye upon a stranger, attired like a squire, in whom he recognised the contours of his fellow-servant Gurth. Anxious concerning master’s fate, and in despair at his sudden disappearance, the translated swineherd was searching for him everywhere, and had neglected, in doing so, the concealment on which his own safety depended. Oswald deemed it his duty to secure Gurth, as a fugitive of whose fate his master was to judge.

249

Renewing his inquiries concerning the fate of Ivanhoe, the only information which the cupbearer could collect from the bystanders was, that the knight had been raised with care by certain well-attired grooms, and placed in a litter belonging to a lady among the spectators, which had immediately transported him out of the press. Oswald, on receiving this intelligence, resolved to return to his master for farther instructions, carrying along with him Gurth, whom he considered in some sort as a deserter from the service of Cedric.

The Saxon had been under very intense and agonising apprehensions concerning his son, for nature had asserted her rights, in spite of the patriotic stoicism which laboured to disown her. But no sooner was he informed that Ivanhoe was in careful, and probably in friendly, hands than the paternal anxiety, which had been excited by the dubiety of his fate, gave way anew to the feeling of injured pride and resentment at what he termed Wilfred’s filial disobedience. “Let him wander his way,” said he; “let those leech his wounds for whose sake he encountered them. He is fitter to do the juggling tricks of the Norman chivalry than to maintain the fame and honour of his English ancestry with the glaive and brown-bill, the good old weapons of his country.”

“If to maintain the honour of ancestry,” said Rowena, who was present, “it is sufficient to be wise in council and

1 Translated. Transformed.

2 Litter. This method of carriage was common in the middle ages, and in the form of the sedan-chair was usual until the present century.

3 Leech. To heal; an Anglo-Saxon word, both verb and noun.

4 Glaive. A sword; from Latin gladius. The brown-bill was a weapon combining the characteristics of both ax and spear.
in execution, to be boldest among the bold, and among the gentle, I know no voice, save his silent, Lady Rowena! on this subject only I hear . Prepare yourself for the Prince's festival: we en summoned thither with unwonted circumstance ur and of courtesy, such as the haughty Normans tely used to our race since the fatal day of Hastings.
"
will I go, were it only to show these proud Normans
e the fate of a son who could defeat their bravest ct a Saxon."
ither," said Rowena, "do I not go; and I pray you re, lest what you mean for courage and constancy accounted hardness of heart."
main at home then, ungrateful lady," answered
"thine is the hard heart, which can sacrifice the an oppressed people to an idle and unauthorised
ent. I seek the noble Athelstane, and with him he banquet of John of Anjou."
went accordingly to the banquet, of which we have mentioned the principal events. Immediately tiring from the castle, the Saxon thanes, with their nts, took horse; and it was during the hustle which l their doing so that Cedric for the first time cast upon the deserter Gurth. The noble Saxon had ed from the banquet, as we have seen, in no very rumour, and wanted but a pretext for wreaking his pon some one. "The gyves!" he said—"the gyves!
—Hundebert! Dogs and villains! why leave ye the fettered?"
out daring to remonstrate, the companions of ound him with a halter, as the readiest cord which . He submitted to the operation without remoncept that, darting a reproachful look at his mas-said, "This comes of loving your flesh and blood in mine own."
"To horse, and forward!" said Cedric.

"It is indeed full time," said the noble Athelstane; "for, if we ride not the faster, the worthy Abbot Waltheoff's preparations for a rere-supper\(^1\) will be altogether spoiled."

The travellers, however, used such speed as to reach the convent of St. Withold's before the apprehended evil took place. The Abbot, himself of ancient Saxon descent, received the noble Saxons with the profuse and exuberant hospitality of their nation, wherein they indulged to a late, or rather an early, hour; nor did they take leave of their reverend host the next morning until they had shared with him a sumptuous refection.

As the cavalcade left the court of the monastery, an incident happened somewhat alarming the Saxons, who, of all people of Europe, were most addicted to a superstitious observance of omens, and to whose opinions can be traced most of those notions upon such subjects still to be found among our popular antiquities. For the Normans being a mixed race, and better informed according to the information of the times, had lost most of the superstitious prejudices which their ancestors had brought from Scandinavia, and piqued themselves upon thinking freely on such topics.

In the present instance, the apprehension of impending evil was inspired by no less respectable a prophet than a large lean black dog, which, sitting upright, howled most piteously as the foremost riders left the gate, and presently afterwards, barking wildly, and jumping to and fro, seemed bent upon attaching itself to the party.

"I like not that music, father Cedric," said Athelstane; for by this title of respect he was accustomed to address him.

"Nor I either, uncle," said Wamba; "I greatly fear we shall have to pay the piper."

"In my mind," said Athelstane, upon whose memory

---

\(^1\) Rere-Supper. A rere-supper was a night-meal, and sometimes called a collation, which was given at a late hour, after the regular supper had made its appearance. L. T. [Scott.]
obot's good ale—for Burton was already famous for ebullient liquor—had made a favourable impression—my mind we had better turn back and abide with the people until the afternoon. It is unlucky to travel where a path is crossed by a monk, a hare, or a howling dog,
a man you have eaten your next meal."
way!” said Cedric, impatiently; “the day is already far for our journey. For the dog, I know it to be the the runaway slave Gurth, a useless fugitive like its saying, and rising at the same time in his stirrups, ent at the interruption of his journey, he launched el at poor Fangs; for Fangs it was, who, having his master thus far upon his stolen expedition, had lost him, and was now, in his uncouth way, rejoicing reappearance. The javelin inflicted a wound upon imal’s shoulder, and narrowly missed pinning him to rth; and Fangs fled howling from the presence of raged thane. Gurth’s heart swelled within him; for this meditated slaughter of his faithful adherent deed much deeper than the harsh treatment he had received. Having in vain attempted to raise his eyes, he said to Wamba, who, seeing his master’s hour, had prudently retreated to the rear, “I pray do me the kindness to wipe my eyes with the skirt of ettle; the dust offends me, and these bonds will not help myself one way or another.”
amba did him the service he required, and they rode side for some time, during which Gurth maintained ly silence. At length he could repress his feelings no friend Wamba,” said he, “of all those who are fools to serve Cedric, thou alone hast dexterity enough
e thy folly acceptable to him. Go to him, therefore,	hon that neither for love nor fear will Gurth serv
He may strike the head from me, he mi scourge me, he may load me with irons, but henceforth he shall never compel me either to love or to obey him. Go to him, then, and tell him that Gurth the son of Beowulph renounces his service.”

“Assuredly,” said Wamba, “fool as I am, I shall not do your fool’s errand. Cedric hath another javelin stuck into his girdle, and thou knowest he does not always miss his mark.”

“I care not,” replied Gurth, “how soon he makes a mark of me. Yesterday he left Wilfred, my young master, in his blood. To-day he has striven to kill before my face the only other living creature that ever showed me kindness. By St. Edmund, St. Dunstan, St. Withold, St. Edward the Confessor, and every other Saxon saint in the calendar (for Cedric never swore by any that was not of Saxon lineage, and all his household had the same limited devotion), I will never forgive him!”

“To my thinking now,” said the Jester, who was frequently wont to act as peacemaker in the family, “our master did not propose to hurt Fangs, but only to affright him. For, if you observed, he rose in his stirrups, as thereby meaning to overcast the mark; and so he would have done, but Fangs happening to bound up at the very moment, received a scratch, which I will be bound to heal with a penny’s breadth of tar.”

“If I thought so,” said Gurth—“if I could but think so; but no, I saw the javelin was well aimed; I heard it whiz through the air with all the wrathful malevolence of him who cast it, and it quivered after it had pitched in the ground, as if with regret for having missed its mark. By the hog dear to St. Anthony, I renounce him!”

And the indignant swineherd resumed his sullen silence, which no efforts of the Jester could again induce him to break.

By the Hog, etc. St. Anthony was supposed to exercise care over the vine.
Meanwhile Cedric and Athelstane, the leaders of the pop, conversed together on the state of the land, on the sensions of the royal family, on the feuds and quarrels among the Norman nobles, and on the chance which there is that the oppressed Saxons might be able to free them-thes from the yoke of the Normans, or at least to elevate themselves into national consequence and independence, using the civil convulsions which were likely to ensue. On a subject Cedric was all animation. The restoration of independence of his race was the idol of his heart, to which he had willingly sacrificed domestic happiness and interests of his own son. But, in order to achieve this revolution in favour of the native English, it was necessary that they should be united among themselves, and under an acknowledged head. The necessity of choosing their chief from the Saxon blood-royal was not only evident in itself, but had been made a solemn condition by those whom Cedric had entrusted with his secret plans and purposes. Athelstane had this quality at least; and though he had few mental accomplishments or talents to recommend him as a leader, he had still a goodly person, was not coward, had been accustomed to martial exercises, and seemed willing to defer to the advice of counsellors more wise than himself. Above all, he was known to be liberal and hospitable, and believed to be good-natured. But whatever pretensions Athelstane had to be considered as head of the Saxon confederacy, many of that nation were dispersed to prefer to his the title of the Lady Rowena, who was of descent from Alfred, and whose father having been a chief renowned for wisdom, courage, and generosity, whose memory was highly honoured by his oppressed countrymen.

It would have been no difficult thing for Cedric, had he been so disposed, to have placed himself at the head of a third party, as formidable at least as any of the others. To counterbalance their royal descent, he had courage, activity, energy, and, above all, that devoted attachment to the cause which had procured him the epithet of The Saxon and his birth was inferior to none, excepting only that of Athelstane and his ward. These qualities, however, were unalloyed by the slightest shade of selfishness; and, instead of dividing yet further his weakened nation by forming a faction of his own, it was a leading part of Cedric's plan to extinguish that which already existed by promoting a marriage betwixt Rowena and Athelstane. An obstacle occurred to this his favourite project in the mutual attachment of his ward and his son; and hence the original cause of the banishment of Wilfred from the house of his father.

This stern measure Cedric had adopted in hopes that, during Wilfred's absence, Rowena might relinquish her preference; but in this hope he was disappointed—a disappointment which might be attributed in part to the mode in which his ward had been educated. Cedric, to whom the name of Alfred was as that of a deity, had treated the sole remaining scion of that great monarch with a degree of observance such as, perhaps, was in those days scarce paid to an acknowledged princess. Rowena's will had been in almost all cases a law to his household; and Cedric himself, as if determined that her sovereignty should be fully acknowledged within that little circle at least, seemed to take a pride in acting as the first of her subjects. Thus trained in the exercise not only of free will but despotic authority, Rowena was, by her previous education, disposed both to resist and to resent any attempt to control her affections, or dispose of her hand contrary to her inclinations, and to assert her independence in a case in which even those females who have been trained up to obedience and subjection are not infrequently apt to dispute the authority of guardians and parents. The opinions which she felt strongly she avowed boldly; and Cedric, who could not free himself from his habitual deference to her opinions, felt totally at a loss how to enforce his authority of guardian.
was in vain that he attempted to dazzle her with the ject of a visionary throne. Rowena, who possessed sense, neither considered his plan as practicable nor able, so far as she was concerned, could it have been . Without attempting to conceal her avowed pren of Wilfred of Ivanhoe, she declared that, were that ed knight out of question, she would rather take in a convent than share a throne with Athelstane, having always despised, she now began, on account trouble she received on his account, thoroughly to vertheless, Cedric, whose opinion of women’s conwas far from strong, persisted in using every means power to bring about the proposed match, in which ceived he was rendering an important service to the cause. The sudden and romantic appearance of his the lists at Ashby he had justly regarded as almost it’s blow to his hopes. His paternal affection, it is ad for an instant gained the victory over pride and ism; but both had returned in full force, and under joint operation he was now bent upon making a deter-effort for the union of Athelstane and Rowena, to-with expediting those other measures which seemed to forward the restoration of Saxon independence.
this last subject he was now labouring with Athelnot without having reason, every now and then, to , like Hotspur,¹ that he should have moved such a skimmed milk to so honourable an action. Athel-it is true, was vain enough, and loved to have his ears with tales of his high descent, and of his right by ance to homage and sovereignty. But his petty van-sufficiently gratified by receiving this homage at the
of his immediate attendants and of the Saxons who ched him. If he had the courage to encounter dan-

¹ See Shakspere’s King Henry IV. Part I. II. 3. 36. “O, I ide myself and go to buffets, for moving such a dish of skimm’d so honorable an action.”
ger, he at least hated the trouble of going to seek it; and while he agreed in the general principles laid down by Cedric concerning the claim of the Saxons to independence, and was still more easily convinced of his own title to reign over them when that independence should be attained, yet when the means of asserting these rights came to be discussed, he was still Athelstane the Unready—slow, irresolute, procrastinating, and unenterprising. The warm and impassioned exhortations of Cedric had as little effect upon his impassive temper as red-hot balls alighting in the water, which produce a little sound and smoke, and are instantly extinguished.

If, leaving this task, which might be compared to spurring a tired jade, or to hammering upon cold iron, Cedric fell back to his ward Rowena, he received little more satisfaction from conferring with her. For, as his presence interrupted the discourse between the lady and her favourite attendant upon the gallantry and fate of Wilfred, Elgitha failed not to revenge both her mistress and herself by recurring to the overthrow of Athelstane in the lists, the most disagreeable subject which could greet the ears of Cedric. To this sturdy Saxon, therefore, the day's journey was fraught with all manner of displeasure and discomfort; so that he more than once internally cursed the tournament, and him who had proclaimed it, together with his own folly in ever thinking of going thither.

At noon, upon the motion of Athelstane, the travellers paused in a woodland shade by a fountain, to repose their horses and partake of some provisions, with which the hospitable Abbot had loaded a sumptuous mule. Their repast was a pretty long one; and these several interruptions rendered it impossible for them to hope to reach Rotherwood without travelling all night, a conviction which induced them to proceed on their way at a more hasty pace than they had hitherto used.
CHAPTER XIX

A train of armed men, some noble dame
Escorting (so their scatter'd words discover'd,
As unperceived I hung upon their rear),
Are close at hand, and mean to pass the night
Within the castle.

Orra, a Tragedy.

The travellers had now reached the verge of the wooded tryst, and were about to plunge into its recesses, held erous at that time from the number of outlaws whom ession and poverty had driven to despair, and who occu-the forests in such large bands as could easily bid defito the feeble police of the period. From these rovers, er, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, Cedric Aethelstane accounted themselves secure, as they had in dance ten servants, besides Wamba and Gurth, whose ould not be counted upon, the one being a jester and ther a captive. It may be added, that in travelling thus through the forest, Cedric and Aethelstane relied on ancest and character as well as their courage. The ows, whom the severity of the forest laws had reduced is roving and desperate mode of life, were chiefly peasand yeomen of Saxon descent, and were generally suprl to respect the persons and property of their country-

As the travellers journeyed on their way, they were red by repeated cries for assistance; and when they up to the place from whence they came, they were sur-d to find a horse-litter placed upon the ground, beside sat a young woman, richly dressed in the Jewish on, while an old man, whose yellow cap proclaimed him to belong to the same nation, walked up and down with gestures expressive of the deepest despair, and wrung his hands as if affected by some strange disaster.

To the inquiries of Athelstane and Cedric, the old Jew could for some time only answer by invoking the protection of all the patriarchs of the Old Testament successively against the sons of Ishmael, who were coming to smite them, hip and thigh, with the edge of the sword. When he began to come to himself out of this agony of terror, Isaac of York (for it was our old friend) was at length able to explain that he had hired a body-guard of six men at Ashby, together with mules for carrying the litter of a sick friend. This party had undertaken to escort him as far as Doncaster. They had come thus far in safety; but, having received information from a wood-cutter that there was a strong band of outlaws lying in wait in the woods before them, Isaac’s mercenaries had not only taken flight, but had carried off with them the horses which bore the litter, and left the Jew and his daughter without the means either of defence or of retreat, to be plundered, and probably murdered, by the banditti, whom they expected every moment would bring down upon them. “Would it but please your valours,” added Isaac, in a tone of deep humiliation, “to permit the poor Jews to travel under your safeguard, I swear by the tables of our Law that never has favour been conferred upon a child of Israel since the days of our captivity which shall be more gratefully acknowledged.”

“Dog of a Jew!” said Athelstane, whose memory was of that petty kind which stores up trifles of all kinds, but particularly trifling offences, “dost not remember how thou didst beard us in the gallery at the tilt-yard? Fight or flee, or compound with the outlaws as thou dost list, ask neither aid nor company from us; and if they rob only such as thee, who rob all the world, I, for mine own share, shall hold them right honest folk.”
eric did not assent to the severe proposal of his com-man. "We shall do better," said he, "to leave them two attendants and two horses to convey them back to the village. It will diminish our strength but little; and your good sword, noble Athelstane, and the aid of who remain, it will be light work for us to face twenty e runagates."

ewena, somewhat alarmed by the mention of outlaws ge, and so near them, strongly seconded the proposal guardian. But Rebecca, suddenly quitting her de-posture, and making her way through the attendants frey of the Saxon lady, knelt down, and, after oriental fashion in addressing superiors, kissed the hem ewena's garment. Then, rising and throwing back her she implored her in the great name of the God whom both worshipped, and by that revelation of the Law Mount Sinai in which they both believed, that she have compassion upon them, and suffer them to go under their safeguard. "It is not for myself that this favour," said Rebecca; "nor is it even for that old man. I know that to wrong and to spoil our nation fault, if not a merit, with the Christians; and what do us whether it be done in the city, in the desert, or field? But it is in the name of one dear to many, and ven to you, that I beseech you to let this sick person supported with care and tenderness under your protec-
For, if evil chance him, the last moment of your life be embittered with regret for denying that which I you."

be noble and solemn air with which Rebecca made this gave it double weight with the fair Saxon.

the man is old and feeble," she said to her guardian, maiden young and beautiful, their friend sick and in
of his life; Jews though they be, we cannot as Chris-leave them in this extremity. Let them unload two of the sumpter mules and put the baggage behind two of the serfs. The mules may transport the litter, and we have led horses for the old man and his daughter.”

Cedric readily assented to what she proposed, and Athelstane only added the condition, “That they should travel in the rear of the whole party, where Wamba,” he said, “might attend them with his shield of boar’s brawn.”

“I have left my shield in the tilt-yard,” answered the Jester, “as has been the fate of many a better knight than myself.”

Athelstane coloured deeply, for such had been his own fate on the last day of the tournament; while Rowena, who was pleased in the same proportion, as if to make amends for the brutal jest of her unfeeling suitor, requested Rebecca to ride by her side.

“It were not fit I should do so,” answered Rebecca, with proud humility, “where my society might be held a disgrace to my protectress.”

By this time the change of baggage was hastily achieved; for the single word “outlaws” rendered every one sufficiently alert, and the approach of twilight made the sound yet more impressive. Amid the bustle, Gurth was taken from horseback, in the course of which removal he prevailed upon the Jester to slack the cord with which his arms were bound. It was so negligently refastened, perhaps intentionally, on the part of Wamba, that Gurth found no difficulty in freeing his arms altogether from bondage, and then, gliding into the thicket, he made his escape from the party.

The bustle had been considerable, and it was some time before Gurth was missed; for, as he was to be placed for the rest of the journey behind a servant, every one supposed that some other of his companions had him under his custody, and when it began to be whispered among them that Gurth had actually disappeared, they were under such immediate expectation of an attack from the outlaws that not held convenient to pay much attention to the circumstance.

The path upon which the party travelled was now so slow as not to admit, with any sort of convenience, above riders abreast, and began to descend into a dingle, travelled by a brook whose banks were broken, swampy, and grown with dwarf willows. Cedric and Athelstane, who at the head of their retinue, saw the risk of being asked at this pass; but neither of them having had much tice in war, no better mode of preventing the danger rred to them than that they should hasten through the e as fast as possible. Advancing, therefore, without h order, they had just crossed the brook with a part their followers, when they were assailed in front, flank, rear at once, with an impetuosity to which, in their con- d and ill-prepared condition, it was impossible to offer tual resistance. The shout of “A white dragon!—a e dragon! St. George[^1] for merry England!” war-cries ed by the assailants, as belonging to their assumed acter of Saxon outlaws, was heard on every side, and very side enemies appeared with a rapidity of advance attack which seemed to multiply their numbers.

Both the Saxon chiefs were made prisoners at the same ent, and each under circumstances expressive of his acter. Cedric, the instant that an enemy appeared, ched at him his remaining javelin, which, taking better t than that which he had hurled at Fangs, nailed the against an oak-tree that happened to be close behind.

Thus far successful, Cedric spurred his horse against ond, drawing his sword at the same time, and striking such inconsiderate fury that his weapon encountered ck branch which hung over him, and he was disarmed e violence of his own blow. He was instantly made prisoner, and pulled from his horse by two or three of the banditti who crowded around him. Athelstane shared his captivity, his bridle having been seized and he himself forcibly dismounted long before he could draw his weapon or assume any posture of effectual defence.

[^1]: St. George. A soldier-saint, adopted as a patron by many of the orders time of the Crusades; in the fourteenth century he became the patron England. A popular legend presents St. George as the slayer of a typical of Satan in his attack upon the Church.

The attendants, embarrassed with baggage, surprised and terrified at the fate of their masters, fell an easy prey to the assailants; while the Lady Rowena, in the centre of the cavalcade, and the Jew and his daughter in the rear, experienced the same misfortune.

Of all the train none escaped except Wamba, who showed upon the occasion much more courage than those who pretended to greater sense. He possessed himself of a sword belonging to one of the domestics, who was just drawing it with a tardy and irresolute hand, laid it about him like a lion, drove back several who approached him, and made a brave though ineffectual attempt to succour his master. Finding himself overpowered, the Jester at length threw himself from his horse, plunged into the thicket, and, favoured by the general confusion, escaped from the scene of action.

Yet the valiant Jester, as soon as he found himself safe, hesitated more than once whether he should not turn back and share the captivity of a master to whom he was sincerely attached.

"I have heard men talk of the blessings of freedom," he said to himself, "but I wish any wise man would teach me what use to make of it now that I have it."

As he pronounced these words aloud, a voice very near him called out in a low and cautious tone, "Wamba!" and at the same time a dog, which he recognised to be Fangs, jumped up and fawned upon him. "Gurth!" answered Wamba with the same caution, and the swineherd immediately stood before him.

"What is the matter?" said he, eagerly; "what mean these cries and that clashing of swords?"
"Only a trick of the times," said Wamba; "they are all prisoners."

"Who are prisoners?" exclaimed Gurth, impatiently.
"My lord, and my lady, and Athelstane, and Hildebert, and Oswald."

"In the name of God!" said Gurth, "how came they prisoners? and to whom?"

"Our master was too ready to fight," said the Jester, "and Athelstane was not ready enough, and no other person was ready at all. And they are prisoners to green cassocks and black visors. And they lie all tumbled about on the green, like the crab-apples that you shake down to your line. And I would laugh at it," said the honest Jester, "I could for weeping." And he shed tears of unfeigned sorrow.

Gurth's countenance kindled. "Wamba," he said, "you hast a weapon, and thy heart was ever stronger than thy brain; we are only two, but a sudden attack from men of resolution will do much; follow me!"

"Whither? and for what purpose?" said the Jester.

"To rescue Cedric."

"But you have renounced his service but now," said Wamba.

"That," said Gurth, "was but while he was fortunate; now me!"

As the Jester was about to obey, a third person suddenly made his appearance and commanded them both to halt. From his dress and arms, Wamba would have conjectured him to be one of those outlaws who had just assaulted his master; but, besides that he wore no mask, the glittering breastplate across his shoulder, with the rich bugle-horn which supported, as well as the calm and commanding expression of his voice and manner, made him, notwithstanding the twilight, recognise Locksley, the yeoman who had been notorious, under such disadvantageous circumstances, in contest for the prize of archery.
“What is the meaning of all this,” said he, “or who is it that rifle, and ransom, and make prisoners in these forests?”

“You may look at their cassocks close by,” said Wamba, “and see whether they be thy children’s coats or no; for they are as like thine own as one green pea-cod is to another.”

“I will learn that presently,” answered Locksley; “and I charge ye, on peril of your lives, not to stir from the place where ye stand, until I have returned. Obey me, and it shall be the better for you and your masters. Yet stay, I must render myself as like these men as possible.”

So saying, he unbuckled his baldric with the bugle, took a feather from his cap, and gave them to Wamba; then drew a vizard1 from his pouch, and repeating his charges to them to stand fast, went to execute his purposes of reconnoitring. “Shall we stand fast, Gurth?” said Wamba, “or shall we e’en give him leg-bail? In my foolish mind, he had all the equipage of a thief too much in readiness to be himself a true man.”

“Let him be the devil,” said Gurth, “an he will. We can be no worse of waiting his return. If he belong to that party, he must already have given them the alarm, and it will avail nothing either to fight or fly. Besides, I have late experience that arrant thieves are not the worst men in the world to have to deal with.”

The yeoman returned in the course of a few minutes.

“Friend Gurth,” he said, “I have mingled among yon men, and have learnt to whom they belong, and whither they are bound. There is, I think, no chance that they will proceed to any actual violence against their prisoners. For three men to attempt them at this moment were little else than madness; for they are good men of war, and have, as such, placed sentinels to give the alarm when any one

---

1 Vizard. Mask; "vizard," "visor," are from French, vis. face, which comes from Latin visus (videre, to see).
hes. But I trust soon to gather such a force as may defiance of all their precautions. You are both serv-
, as I think, faithful servants, of Cedric the Saxon, and of the rights of Englishmen. He shall not want hands to help him in this extremity. Come, then,
, until I gather more aid.”
paying, he walked through the wood at a great pace, by the jester and the swineherd. It was not conwith Wamba’s humour to travel long in silence.
think,” said he, looking at the baldric and bugle still carried, “that I saw the arrow shot which won prize, and that not so long since as Christmas.”
and I,” said Gurth, “could take it on my halidome have heard the voice of the good yeoman who won it, ast well as by day, and that the moon is not three her since I did so.”
the honest friends,” replied the yeoman, “who or m is little to the present purpose; should I free your you will have reason to think me the best friend you er had in your lives. And whether I am known by he or another, or whether I can draw a bow as well
r than a cow-keeper,\(^1\) or whether it is my pleasure in sunshine or by moonlight, are matters which, as not concern you, so neither need ye busy yourselves ng them.”
ir heads are in the lion’s mouth,” said Wamba, in a to Gurth, “get them out how we can.”
sh—be silent,” said Gurth. “Offend him not by thy and I trust sincerely that all will go well.”

\(^1\) Compare Shakespeare’s phrase, King Lear IV. 6. 88, “That ldles his bow like a crow-keeper,” i. e., like a scare-crow.
CHAPTER XX

When autumn nights were long and drear,
And forest walks were dark and dim,
How sweetly on the pilgrim’s ear
Was wont to steal the hermit’s hymn!

Devotion borrows Music’s tone,
And Music took Devotion’s wing;
And, like the bird that hails the sun,
They soar to heaven, and soaring sing.

_The Hermit of St. Clement’s Well._

It was after three hours’ good walking that the servants of Cedric, with their mysterious guide, arrived at a small opening in the forest, in the centre of which grew an oak-tree of enormous magnitude, throwing its twisted branches in every direction. Beneath this tree four or five yeomen lay stretched on the ground, while another, as sentinel, walked to and fro in the moonlight shade.

Upon hearing the sound of feet approaching, the watch instantly gave the alarm, and the sleepers as suddenly started up and bent their bows. Six arrows placed on the string were pointed towards the quarter from which the travellers approached, when their guide, being recognised, was welcomed with every token of respect and attachment, and all signs and fears of a rough reception at once subsided.

“Where is the Miller?” was his first question.

“On the road towards Rotherham.”

“With how many?” demanded the leader, for such he seemed to be.

“With six men, and good hope of booty, if it please St. Nicholas.”

“Devoutly spoken,” said Locksley; “and where is Allan-Dale?”
“Walked up towards the Watling Street\textsuperscript{1} to watch for the Prior of Jorvaulx.”

“That is well thought on also,” replied the Captain; “and where is the Friar?”

“In his cell.”

“Thither will I go,” said Locksley. “Disperse and seek your companions. Collect what force you can, for there’s no afoot that must be hunted hard, and will turn to bay. Meet me here by daybreak. And, stay,” he added, “I have forgotten what is most necessary of the whole. Two of you go the road quickly towards Torquilstone, the castle of Mont-de-Bœuf. A set of gallants, who have been masquerading in such guise as our own, are carrying a band of prisoners thither. Watch them closely, for even if they reach the castle before we collect our force, our honour is concerned to punish them, and we will find means to do so. Keep a close watch on them, therefore; and despatch one of our comrades, the lightest of foot, to bring the news of the men thereabout.”

They promised implicit obedience, and departed with celerity on their differing errands. In the mean while, their leader and his two companions, who now looked upon him with great respect, as well as some fear, pursued their way to the chapel of Copmanhurst.

When they had reached the little moonlight glade, having in front the reverend though ruinous chapel and the hermitage, so well suited to ascetic devotion, Wamba whispered to Gurth, “If this be the habitation of a thief, it makes good the old proverb, ‘The nearer the church the further from God.’ And by my coxcomb,”\textsuperscript{2} he added, “I think it be even so. Harken but to the black sanctus\textsuperscript{3} which they are singing in the hermitage!”

\textsuperscript{1}\textit{Watling-Street}. An ancient Roman road running north from Dover.

\textsuperscript{2}\textit{Cockscomb}. The crest of the fool’s cap.

\textsuperscript{3}\textit{Black Sanctus}. A burlesque upon the anthem, \textit{Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of hosts}.
In fact, the anchorite and his guest were performing, at the full extent of their very powerful lungs, an old drinking song, of which this was the burden:

‘Come, trowl the brown bowl to me,
    Bully boy, bully boy,
Come, trowl the brown bowl to me.
    Ho! jolly Jenkin, I spy a knave in drinking,
Come, trowl the brown bowl to me.’

“Now, that is not ill sung,” said Wamba, who had thrown in a few of his own flourishes to help out the chorus. “But who, in the saint’s name, ever expected to have heard such a jolly chant come from out a hermit’s cell at midnight!”

“Marry, that should I,” said Gurth, “for the jolly Clerk of Copmanhurst is a known man, and kills half the deer that are stolen in this walk. Men say that the keeper has complained to his official, and that he will be stripped of his cowl and cope altogether if he keep not better order.”

While they were thus speaking, Locksley’s loud and repeated knocks had at length disturbed the anchorite and his guest. “By my heads,” said the hermit, stopping short in a grand flourish, “here come more benighted guests. I would not for my cowl that they found us in this goodly exercise. All men have their enemies, good Sir Sluggard; and there be those malignant enough to construe the hospitable refreshment which I have been offering to you, a weary traveller, for the matter of three short hours, into sheer drunkenness and debauchery, vices alike alien to my profession and my disposition.”

“Base calumniators!” replied the knight; “I would I had the chastising of them. Nevertheless, Holy Clerk, it is true that all have their enemies; and there be those in this very land whom I would rather speak to through the bars of my helmet than barefaced.”
“Get thine iron pot on thy head then, friend Sluggard, as quickly as thy nature will permit,” said the hermit, while I remove these pewter flagons, whose late contents run strangely in mine own pate; and to drown the clatter—or, in faith, I feel somewhat unsteady—strike into the one which thou hearest me sing. It is no matter for the words; I scarce know them myself.”

So saying, he struck up a thundering De profundis clamavi, under cover of which he removed the apparatus of their banquet; while the knight, laughing heartily, and armimg himself all the while, assisted his host with his voice from time to time as his mirth permitted.

“What devil’s matins are you after at this hour?” said voice from without.

“Heaven forgive you, Sir Traveller!” said the hermit, whose own voice, and perhaps his nocturnal potations, prevented from recognising accents which were tolerably familiar to him. “Wend on your way, in the name of God and St. Dunstan, and disturb not the devotions of me and my holy brother.”

“Mad priest,” answered the voice from without, “open to Locksley!”

“All’s safe—all’s right,” said the hermit to his companion.

“But who is he?” said the Black Knight; “it imports me much to know.”

“Who is he?” answered the hermit; “I tell thee he is a friend.”

“But what friend?” answered the knight; “for he may be friend to thee and none of mine?”

“What friend!” replied the hermit; “that, now, is one of the questions that is more easily asked than answered. What friend! why, he is, now that I bethink me a little, the very same honest keeper I told thee of a while since.”

“Ay, as honest a keeper as thou art a pious hermit;”

Profundis clamavi. “Out of the depths have I cried.” Psalms CXXX.
replied the knight, “I doubt it not. But undo the door to him before he beat it from its hinges.”

The dogs, in the mean time, which had made a dreadful baying at the commencement of the disturbance, seemed now to recognise the voice of him who stood without; for, totally changing their manner, they scratched and whined at the door, as if interceding for his admission. The hermit speedily unbolted his portal, and admitted Locksley, with his two companions.

“Why, hermit,” was the yeoman’s first question as soon as he beheld the knight, “what boon companion hast thou here?”

“A brother of our order,” replied the Friar, shaking his head; “we have been at our orisons all night.”

“He is a monk of the church militant, I think,” answered Locksley; “and there be more of them abroad. I tell thee, Friar, thou must lay down the rosary and take up the quarterstaff; we shall need every one of our merry men, whether clerk or layman. But,” he added, taking him a step aside, “art thou mad? to give admittance to a knight thou dost not know? Hast thou forgot our articles?”

“Not know him!” replied the Friar, boldly, “I know him as well as the beggar knows his dish.”

“And what is his name, then?” demanded Locksley.

“His name,” said the hermit—“his name is Sir Anthony of Scamblestone; as if I would drink with a man, and did not know his name!”

“Thou hast been drinking more than enough, Friar,” said the woodsman, “and, I fear, prating more than enough too.”

“Good yeoman,” said the knight, coming forward, “be not wroth with my merry host. He did but afford me the hospitality which I would have compelled from him if he had refused it.”

“Thou compel!” said the Friar; “wait but till I have changed this grey gown for a green cassock, and if I make a quarter-staff ring twelve upon thy pate, I am neither a clerk nor good woodsman."

While he spoke thus, he stript off his gown, and appareled in a close black buckram doublet and drawers, over which he speedily did on a cassock of green and hose of same colour. "I pray thee, truss my points," said he Wamba, "and thou shalt have a cup of sack² for thy labour."

"Gramercy for thy sack," said Wamba; "but think'st thou it is lawful for me to aid you to transmew³ thyself from thy motley hermit into a sinful forester?"

"Never fear," said the hermit; "I will but confess the flaw of my green cloak to my grey friar's frock, and all shall well again."

"Amen!" answered the Jester. "A broadcloth penitent should have a sackcloth confessor, and your frock may abate my motley doublet into the bargain."

So saying, he accommodated the Friar with his assistance in tying the endless number of points, as the laces attached the hose to the doublet were then termed. While they were thus employed, Locksley led the knight tittle apart, and addressed him thus: "Deny it not, Sir right, you are he who decided the victory to the advance of the English against the strangers on the second day of the tournament at Ashby."

"And what follows if you guess truly, good yeoman?" inquired the knight.

"I should in that case hold you," replied the yeoman, "and I would not willingly that there be reason to think otherwise of me."

---

¹ Truss My Points. Tie the laces. These garments were fastened with lugs; buttons were not used.
² Sack. A Spanish wine; the name (from Latin, siccus) describes it as a dry, so-called.
³ Transmew. Transmute.
“But for my purpose,” said the yeoman, “thou shouldst be as well a good Englishman as a good knight; for that which I have to speak of concerns, indeed, the duty of every honest man, but is more especially that of a true-born native of England.”

“You can speak to no one,” replied the knight, “to whom England, and the life of every Englishman, can be dearer than to me.”

“I would willingly believe so,” said the woodsman, “for never had this country such need to be supported by those who love her. Hear me, and I will tell thee of an enterprise in which, if thou be’st really that which thou seemest, thou mayst take an honourable part. A band of villains, in the disguise of better men than themselves, have made themselves master of the person of a noble Englishman, called Cedric the Saxon, together with his ward and his friend Athelstane of Coningsburgh, and have transported them to a castle in this forest called Torquilstone. I ask of thee, as a good knight and a good Englishman, wilt thou aid in their rescue?”

“I am bound by my vow to do so,” replied the knight; “but I would willingly know who you are, who request my assistance in their behalf?”

“I am,” said the forester, “a nameless man; but I am the friend of my country, and of my country’s friends. With this account of me you must for the present remain satisfied, the more especially since you yourself desire to continue unknown. Believe, however, that my word, when pledged, is as inviolate as if I wore golden spurs.”

“I willingly believe it,” said the knight; “I have been accustomed to study men’s countenances, and I can read in thine honesty and resolution. I will, therefore, ask thee no further questions, but aid thee in setting at freedom these oppressed captives; which done, I trust we shall part better acquainted, and well satisfied with each other.”

“So,” said Wamba to Gurth; for the Friar being now
ipped, the Jester, having approached to the other hut, had heard the conclusion of the conversation: we have got a new ally? I trust the valour of the, still be truer metal than the religion of the hermit. neyesty of the yeoman; for this Locksley looks like a licker-stealer, and the priest like a lusty hypocrite. And thy peace, Wamba,” said Gurth; “it may all be as you guess; but were the horned devil to rise and profess assistance to set at liberty Cedric and the Lady I fear I should hardly have religion enough to de- fowl fiend’s offer, and bid him get behind me.”

Friar was now completely accoutred as a yeoman, sword and buckler, bow and quiver, and a strong parer his shoulder. He left his cell at the head of the ced, having carefully locked the door, deposited the r the threshold.

thou in condition to do good service, Friar,” said "or does the brown bowl still run in thy head?” more than a draught of St. Dunstan’s fountain will answer the priest; “something there is of a whiz- gry brain, and of instability in my legs, but you shall see both pass away.”

lying, he stepped to the stone basin, in which the fountain as they fell formed bubbles which in the white moonlight, and took so long a draught had meant to exhaust the spring.

in didst thou drink as deep a draught of water be- Clerk of Copmanhurst?” said the Black Knight. ver since my wine butt leaked, and let out its liquor gal vent,” replied the Friar, “and so left me noth- ink but my patron’s bounty here.”

plunging his hands and head into the fountain, d from them all marks of the midnight revel.

refreshed and sobered, the jolly priest twirled his gotharian round his head with three fingers, as if he had been balancing a reed, exclaiming at the same time, "Where be those false ravishers who carry off wenches against their will? May the foul fiend fly off with me, if I am not man enough for a dozen of them."

A kind of halberd.

"Swearest thou, Holy Clerk?" said the Black Knight.

"Clerk me no clerks," replied the transformed priest; "by St. George and the Dragon, I am no longer a shaveling than while my frock is on my back. When I am cased in my green cassock, I will drink, swear, and woo a lass with any blythe forester in the West Riding."

"Come on, Jack Priest," said Locksley, "and be silent; thou art as noisy as a whole convent on a holy eve, when the Father Abbot has gone to bed. Come on you, too, my masters, tarry not to talk of it—I say, come on; we must collect all our forces, and few enough we shall have, if we are to storm the castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf."

"What! is it Front-de-Bœuf," said the Black Knight, "who has stopt on the king's highway the king's liege subjects? Is he turned thief and oppressor?"

"Oppressor he ever was," said Locksley.

"And for thief," said the priest, "I doubt if ever he were even half so honest a man as many a thief of my acquaintance."

"Move on, priest, and be silent," said the yeoman; "it were better you led the way to the place of rendezvous than say what should be left unsaid, both in decency and prudence."
CHAPTER XXI

Alas, how many hours and years have past,
Since human forms have round this table sate,
Or lamp, or taper, on its surface gleam’d!
Methinks, I hear the sound of time long pass’d Still murmuring o’er us, in the lofty void
Of these dark arches, like the ling’ring voices
Of those who long within their graves have slept.

Orra, a Tragedy.

While these measures were taking in behalf of Cedric his companions, the armed men by whom the latter had seized hurried their captives along towards the place security where they intended to imprison them. But imperfectly known to the marauders. They were commented to make several long halts, and once or twice to return on their road to resume the direction which they intended to pursue. The summer morn had dawned upon a era they could travel in full assurance that they held right path. But confidence returned with light, and cavalcade now moved rapidly forward. Meanwhile, the wing dialogue took place between the two leaders of the litti:

"It is time thou shouldst leave us, Sir Maurice," said Templar to De Bracy, "in order to prepare the second of thy mystery. Thou art next, thou knowest, to act Knight Deliverer."

"I have thought better of it," said De Bracy; "I will not be thee till the prize is fairly deposited in Front-de-f's castle. There will I appear before the Lady Rowena in own shape, and trust that she will set down to th vehemence of my passion the violence of which I have been guilty."

"And what has made thee change thy plan, De Bracy?" replied the Knight Templar.

"That concerns thee nothing," answered his companion.

"I would hope, however, Sir Knight," said the Templar, "that this alteration of measures arises from no suspicion of my honourable meaning, such as Fitzurse endeavoured instil into thee?"

"My thoughts are my own," answered De Bracy; "I know laughs, they say, when one thief robs another; and I know, that were he to spit fire and brimstone instead would never prevent a Templar from following his bent.

"Or the leader of a Free Company," answered De Bracy, "from dreading at the hands of a comrade friend the injustice he does to all mankind."

"This is unprofitable and perilous recrimination," answered De Bracy; "suffice it to say, I know the morals of the Temple Order, and I will not give thee the power of charging me out of the fair prey for which I have run such risks."

"Psha," replied the Templar, "what hast thou to fear? Thou knowest the vows of our order."

"Right well," said De Bracy, "and also how they are kept. Come, Sir Templar, the laws of gallantry have several interpretation in Palestine, and this is a case in which I will trust nothing to your conscience."

"Hear the truth, then," said the Templar; "I care for your blue-eyed beauty. There is in that train one who will make me a better mate."

"What! wouldst thou stoop to the waiting damsel?" De Bracy.

"No, Sir Knight," said the Templar, haughtily. the waiting-woman will I not stoop. I have a prize and the captives as lovely as thine own."

"By the mass, thou meanest the fair Jewess!" said De Bracy.
And if I do,” said Bois-Guilbert, “who shall gainsay
No one that I know,” said De Bracy, “unless it be your of celibacy or a check of conscience for an intrigue Jewess.”
For my vow,” said the Templar, “our Grand Master granted me a dispensation. And for my conscience, that has slain three hundred Saracens need not up every little failing, like a village girl at her first ession upon Good Friday eve.”
Thou knowest best thine own privileges,” said De Yet, I would have sworn thy thought had been the old usurer’s money-bags than on the black eyes daughter.”
I can admire both,” answered the Templar; “besides, Jew is but half-prize. I must share his spoils with de-Bœuf, who will not lend us the use of his castle ething. I must have something that I can term exby this foray of ours, and I have fixed on lovely Jewess as my peculiar prize. But, now thou est my drift, thou wilt resume thine own original plan, not? Thou hast nothing, thou seest, to fear from herence.”
No,” replied De Bracy, “I will remain beside my prize.
thou sayst is passing true, but I like not the privileges red by the dispensation of the Grand Master, and the quired by the slaughter of three hundred Saracens.
have too good a right to a free pardon to render you scrupulous about peccadilloes.”
While this dialogue was proceeding, Cedric was enouring to wring out of those who guarded him an al of their character and purpose. “You should be ishmen,” said he; “and yet, sacred Heaven! you prey your countrymen as if you were very Normans. You ld be my neighbours, and, if so, my friends; for which English neighbours have reason to be otherwise? A tell ye, yeomen, that even those among ye who have been branded with outlawry have had from me protection; for I have pitied their miseries, and curst the oppression of their tyrannic nobles. What, then, would you have of me? or in what can this violence serve ye? Ye are worse than brute beasts in your actions, and will you imitate them in their very dumbness?"

It was in vain that Cedric expostulated with his guards, who had too many good reasons for their silence to be induced to break it either by his wrath or his expostulations. They continued to hurry him along, travelling at a very rapid rate, until, at the end of an avenue of huge trees, arose Torquilstone, now the hoary and ancient castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf. It was a fortress of no great size, consisting of a donjon, or large and high square tower, surrounded by buildings of inferior height, which were encircled by an inner courtyard. Around the exterior wall was a deep moat, supplied with water from a neighbouring rivulet. Front-de-Bœuf, whose character placed him often at feud with his enemies, had made considerable additions to the strength of his castle, by building towers upon the outward wall, so as to flank it at every angle. The access, as usual in castles of the period, lay through an arched barbican, or outwork, which was terminated and defended by a small turret at each corner.

Cedric no sooner saw the turrets of Front-de-Bœuf's castle raise their grey and moss-grown battlements, glimmering in the morning sun above the wood by which they were surrounded, than he instantly augured more truly concerning the cause of his misfortune.

"I did injustice," he said, "to the thieves and outlaws of these woods, when I supposed such banditti to belong to their bands; I might as justly have confounded the foxes of these brakes with the ravening wolves of France. Tell me, dogs, is it my life or my wealth that your master aims at? Is it too much that two Saxons, myself and the noble Athalstane, should hold land in the country which was once the patrimony of our race? Put us, then, to death, and complete your tyranny by taking our lives, as you began with our liberties. If the Saxon Cedric cannot rescue England, he is willing to die for her. Tell your tyrannical master, I do only beseech him to dismiss the Lady Rowena in honour and safety. She is a woman, and he need not dread her; and with us will die all who dare fight in her cause."

The attendants remained as mute to this address as to the former, and they now stood before the gate of the castle. De Bracy winded his horn three times, and the archers and cross-bow men, who had manned the wall upon seeing their approach, hastened to lower the drawbridge and admit them. The prisoners were compelled by their guards to alight, and were conducted to an apartment where a hasty repast was offered them, of which none but Athelstane felt any inclination to partake. Neither had the descendant of the Confessor much time to do justice to the good cheer placed before them, for their guards gave him and Cedric to understand that they were to be imprisoned in a chamber apart from Rowena. Resistance was vain; and they were compelled to follow to a large room, which, rising on clumsy Saxon pillars, resembled those refectories¹ and chapter-houses² which may be still seen in the most ancient parts of our most ancient monasteries.

The Lady Rowena was next separated from her train, and conducted, with courtesy, indeed, but still without consulting her inclination, to a distant apartment. The same alarming distinction was conferred on Rebecca, in spite of her father's entreaties, who offered even money, in this extremity of distress, that she might be permitted to abide with him. "Base unbeliever," answered one of his guards, "when thou hast seen thy lair, thou wilt not wish thy daughter to partake it." And, without farther discussion, the old Jew was forcibly dragged off in a different direction from the other prisoners. The domestics, after being carefully searched and disarmed, were confined in another part of the castle; and Rowena was refused even the comfort she might have derived from the attendance of her handmaiden Elgitha.

¹ Refectories. The large dining-rooms of the monasteries.
² Chapter-houses. Headquarters or assembly-places for officers and members of the religious or fraternal orders.

The apartment in which the Saxon chiefs were confined, for to them we turn our first attention, although at present used as a sort of guard-room, had formerly been the great hall of the castle. It was now abandoned to meaner purposes, because the present lord, among other additions to the convenience, security, and beauty of his baronial residence, had erected a new and noble hall, whose vaulted roof was supported by lighter and more elegant pillars, and fitted up with that higher degree of ornament which the Normans had already introduced into architecture.

Cedric paced the apartment, filled with indignant reflections on the past and on the present, while the apathy of his companion served, instead of patience and philosophy, to defend him against everything save the inconvenience of the present moment; and so little did he feel even this last that he was only from time to time roused to a reply by Cedric's animated and impassioned appeal to him.

"Yes," said Cedric, half speaking to himself and half addressing himself to Athelstane, "it was in this very hall that my [grand-]father feasted with Torquil Woldganger, when he entertained the valiant and unfortunate Harold, then advancing against the Norwegians, who had united themselves to the rebel Tosti. It was in this hall that Harold returned the magnanimous answer to the ambassador of his rebel brother. Oft have I heard my father kindle as he told the tale. The envoy of Tosti was admitted, when this ample room could scarce contain the crowd of noble

1 Harold. Read Bulwer-Lytton's romance and Tennyson's drama, each bearing the title Harold. See also Green's Short History, Chap. x., Sec. IV.
rs who were quaffing the blood-red wine around ch."
" said Athelstane, somewhat moved by this part d’s discourse, “they will not forget to send us reflections at noon: we had scarce a breathing-to break our fast, and I never have the benefit when I eat immediately after dismounting from ough the leeches recommend that practice.”
ent on with his story without noticing this in-observation of his friend.
voy of Tosti,” he said, “moved up the hall, un-
the frowning countenances of all around him, ade his obeisance before the throne of King

terms,’ he said, ‘Lord King, hath thy brother pe, if he should lay down his arms and crave hands?’
ther’s love,’ cried the generous Harold, ‘and the of Northumberland.
ould Tosti accept these terms,’ continued the
it lands shall be assigned to his faithful ally, King of Norway?’
feet of English ground,’ answered Harold,‘as Hardrada is said to be a giant, perhaps we im twelve inches more.’” ll rung with acclamations, and cup and horn was Norwegian, who should be speedily in posses-English territory.”
I have pledged him with all my soul,” said
“for my tongue cleaves to my palate.”
iffed envoy,” continued Cedric, pursuing with is tale, though it interested not the listener, “re-ary to Tosti and his ally the ominous answer-brother. It was then that the distant towers the bloody streams of the Derwent¹ beheld that.

See Appendix, note D. [Scott.]
direful conflict, in which, after displaying the most daunted valour, the King of Norway and Tosti both with ten thousand of their bravest followers. Who have thought that, upon the proud day when this battle won, the very gale which waved the Saxon banner of triumph was filling the Norman sails, and impelling to the fatal shores of Sussex? Who would have thou-that Harold, within a few brief days, would himself put no more of his kingdom than the share which he allotted his wrath to the Norwegian invader? Who would thought that you, noble Athelstane—that you, descentant of Harold’s blood, and that I, whose father was not the defender of the Saxon crown, should be prisoners to Norman, in the very hall in which our ancestors held high festival?"

"It is sad enough," replied Athelstane; "but I trust will hold us to a moderate ransom. At any rate, it can be their purpose to starve us outright; and yet, although it is high noon, I see no preparations for serving dinnor.
Look up at the window, noble Cedric, and judge by the timber of beams if it is not on the verge of noon."

"It may be so," answered Cedric; "but I cannot look at that stained lattice without its awakening other reflections. When that window was wrought, my noble fathers our hardy fathers knew not the art of making glass, staining it. The pride of Wolfganger’s father brought artist from Normandy to adorn his hall with this species of emblazonment, that breaks the golden light of God’s blessed day into so many fantastic hues. The squire came here poor, beggarly, cringing, and subser-rect ready to doff his cap to the meanest native of the house.
He returned pampered and proud to tell his rapacious triumph of the wealth and the simplicity of the S nobles—a folly, O Athelstane! foreboded of old, as we foreseen by those descendants of Wengist and his b ones who retained the simplicity of their manners. We de these strangers our bosom friends, our confidential ysts; we borrowed their artists and their arts, and ised the honest simplicity and hardihood with which brave ancestors supported themselves; and we became vated by Norman arts long ere we fell under Norman
s. Far better was our homely diet, eaten in peace and ry, than the luxurious dainties, the love of which hath ered us as bondsmen to the foreign conqueror!"

"I should," replied Athelstane, "hold very humble diet cury at present; and it astonishes me, noble Cedric, that can bear so truly the memory of past deeds, it appeareth you forget the very hour of dinner."

"It is time lost," muttered Cedric apart and impatiently, speak to him of aught else but that which concerns his tite! The soul of Hardicanute\(^1\) hath taken possession im, and he hath no pleasure save to fill, to will, and to for more. Alas!" said he, looking at Athelstane with passion, "that so dull a spirit should be lodged in so ly a form! Alas! that such an enterprise as the re-ration of England should turn on a hinge so imperfect!
ed to Rowena, indeed, her nobler and more generous ay yet awake the better nature which is torpid within
. Yet how should this be, while Rowena, Athelstane, imself remain the prisoners of this brutal marauder, have been made so perhaps from a sense of the dangers ch our liberty might bring to the usurped power of his on?"

While the Saxon was plunged in these painful reflectes, the door of their prison opened and gave entrance to er,\(^2\) holding his white rod of office. This important anvanced into the chamber with a grave pace, fold by four attendants, bearing in a table covered with

\(^1\) Hardicanute. The son of Canute and King of England (1040-1042).
\(^2\) Ewer. A head-servant who presided over the meats; from Old English pilled meat.
dishes, the sight and smell of which seemed to be an instant compensation to Athelstane for all the inconvenience he had undergone. The persons who attended on the feast were masked and cloaked.

“What mummary is this?” said Cedric; “think you that we are ignorant whose prisoners we are, when we are in the castle of your master? Tell him,” he continued, willing to use this opportunity to open a negotiation for his freedom—“tell your master, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, that we know no reason he can have for withholding our liberty, excepting his unlawful desire to enrich himself at our expense. Tell him that we yield to his rapacity, as in similar circumstances we should do to that of a literal robber. Let him name the ransom at which he rates our liberty, and it shall be paid, providing the exaction is suited to our means.”

The sewer made no answer, but bowed his head.

“And tell Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf,” said Athelstane, “that I send him my mortal defiance, and challenge him to combat with me, on foot or horseback, at any secure place, within eight days after our liberation; which, if he be a true knight, he will not, under these circumstances, venture to refuse or to delay.”

“I shall deliver to the knight your defiance,” answered the sewer; “meanwhile I leave you to your food.”

The challenge of Athelstane was delivered with no good grace; for a large mouthful, which required the exercise of both jaws at once, added to a natural hesitation, considerably damped the effect of the bold defiance it contained. Still, however, his speech was hailed by Cedric as an incontestable token of reviving spirit in his companion, whose previous indifference had begun, notwithstanding his respect for Athelstane’s descent, to wear out his patience. But he now cordially shook hands with him in token of his approbation, and was somewhat grieved when Athelstane observed, “That he would fight a dozen such men as Front-de-Bœuf, if by so doing he could hasten his departure from dungeon where they put so much garlic into their potage.” Notwithstanding this intimation of a relapse into the apathy of sensuality, Cedric placed himself opposite to Athelstane, and soon showed that, if the distresses of his country could banish the recollection of food while the table was uncovered, yet no sooner were the victuals put there than he proved that the appetite of his Saxon ancestors had descended to him along with their other qualities.

The captives had not long enjoyed their refreshment, however, ere their attention was disturbed even from this most serious occupation by the blast of a horn winded before the gate. It was repeated three times, with as much violence as if it had been blown before an enchanted castle by the destined knight at whose summons halls and towers, barbican and battlement, were to roll off like a morning pour. The Saxons started from the table and hastened to the window. But their curiosity was disappointed; for these outlets only looked upon the court of the castle, and the sound came from beyond its precincts. The summons, however, seemed of importance, for a considerable degree of bustle instantly took place in the castle.
CHAPTER XXII

My daughter! O my ducats! O my daughter!
. . . O my Christian ducats!
Justice! the Law! my ducats, and my daughter!

Merchant of Venice.

Leaving the Saxon chiefs to return to their banquet as soon as their ungratified curiosity should permit them to attend to the calls of their half-satiated appetite, we have to look in upon the yet more severe imprisonment of Isaac of York. The poor Jew had been hastily thrust into a dungeon-vault of the castle, the floor of which was deep beneath the level of the ground, and very damp, being lower than even the moat itself. The only light was received through one or two loop-holes far above the reach of the captive's hand. These apertures admitted, even at midday, only a dim and uncertain light, which was changed for utter darkness long before the rest of the castle had lost the blessing of day. Chains and shackles, which had been the portion of former captives, from whom active exertions to escape had been apprehended, hung rusted and empty on the walls of the prison, and in the rings of one of those sets of fetters there remained two mouldering bones, which seemed to have been once those of the human leg, as if some prisoner had been left not only to perish there, but to be consumed to a skeleton.

At one end of this ghastly apartment was a large fire-grate, over the top of which were stretched some transverse iron bars, half-devoured with rust.

The whole appearance of the dungeon might have appalled a stouter heart than that of Isaac, who, neverthewas more composed under the imminent pressure of danger than he had seemed to be while affected by terrors of which the cause was as yet remote and contingent. The faders of the chase say that the hare feels more agony during the pursuit of the greyhounds than when she is struggling in their fangs.\(^1\) And thus it is probable that the Jews, the very frequency of their fear on all occasions, had their minds in some degree prepared for every effort of any which could be practised upon them; so that no coercion, when it had taken place, could bring with it that surprise which is the most disabling quality of terror. Neither was it the first time that Isaac had been placed in circumstances so dangerous. He had therefore experience to guide him, as well as hope that he might again, as forcibly, be delivered as a prey from the fowler. Above all, that upon his side the unyielding obstinacy of his nation, that unbending resolution with which Israelites have so frequently known to submit to the uttermost evils which power and violence can inflict upon them, rather than gratify their oppressors by granting their demands. In this humour of passive resistance, and with his garment collected beneath him to keep his limbs from the wet, Isaac sat in a corner of his dungeon, where his tied hands, his dishevelled hair and beard, his furrowed cheek and high cap, seen by the wiry and broken light, could have afforded a study for Rembrandt, had that celebrated painter existed at the period. The Jew remained about altering his position for nearly three hours, at the ring of which steps were heard on the dungeon stair. As bolts screamed as they were withdrawn, the hinges creaked as the wicket opened, and Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, followed by the two Saracen slaves of the Templar, entered the prison.

Front-de-Bœuf, a tall and strong man, whose life had been spent in public war or in private feuds and broils, who had hesitated at no means of extending his power, had features corresponding to his character, which strongly expressed the fiercer and more malice passions of the mind. The scars with which his visage seamed would, on features of a different cast, have excited the sympathy and veneration due to the marks of honorable valour; but, in the peculiar case of Front-de-Beuf, they only added to the ferocity of his countenance, the dread which his presence inspired. This formidible baron was clad in a leathern doublet, fitted close to his person and was frayed and soiled with the stains of his adventures. He had no weapon, excepting a poniard at his belt, which was hung at his right side.

\(^{1}\) In Their Fangs. Nota Bene. We by no means warrant the accuracy of this piece of natural history, which we give on the authority of the Warms. L. T. [Scott.]*

The black slaves who attended Front-de-Beuf were stripped of their gorgeous apparel, and attired in coarse garments, and trowsers of coarse linen, their sleeves being tucked above the elbow, like those of butchers when about to perform their function in the slaughter-house. Each had a small pannier; and, when they entered the door, they stopped at the door until Front-de-Beuf himself, fully locked and double-locked it. Having taken the greatest caution, he advanced slowly up the apartment toward the Jew, upon whom he kept his eye fixed, as if he wished to paralyse him with his glance, as some animals are wont to do to fascinate their prey. It seemed, indeed, as if the sullen, malignant eye of Front-de-Beuf possessed some power over his unfortunate prisoner, for the Jew sate with his mouth agape, and his eyes fixed on the savage baron with such earnestness of terror that his features seemed literally to shrink together, and to diminish while encountering the fierce Norman's fixed and inquiring gaze. The unhappy Isaac was deprived not only of his power of rising to make the obeisance which his ten ed, but he could not even doff his cap, or utter any word of supplication; so strongly was he agitated by the conviction that tortures and death were impending over him.

On the other hand, the stately form of the Norman ap-}ned to dilate in magnitude, like that of the eagle, which fies up its plumage when about to pounce on its defence-} prey. He paused within three steps of the corner in which the unfortunate Jew had now, as it were, coiled himself up into the smallest possible space, and made a sign for one of the slaves to approach. The black satellite came forward accordingly, and, producing from his basket a large set of scales and several weights, he laid them at the feet Front-de-Bœuf, and again retired to the respectful dis-}nce at which his companion had already taken his station. The motions of these men were slow and solemn, as if they impeded over their souls some preconception of horror and of cruelty. Front-de-Bœuf himself opened the scene by thus addressing his ill-fated captive.

"Most accursed dog of an accursed race," he said, awak-}ing with his deep and sullen voice the sullen echoes of his}ageon-vault, "seest thou these scales?"

The unhappy Jew returned a feeble affirmative.

"In these very scales shalt thou weigh me out," said the}entless Baron, "a thousand silver pounds, after the just mea-}sure and weight of the Tower of London."

"Holy Abraham!" returned the Jew, finding voice}ough the very extremity of his danger, "heard man ever} a demand? Who ever heard, even in a minstrel's tale, such a sum as a thousand pounds of silver. What human heart was ever blessed with the vision of such a mass of mea-}ure? Not within the walls of York, ransack my house} that of all my tribe, wilt thou find the tithe of that huge am of silver that thou speakest of."

"I am reasonable," answered Front-de-Bœuf, "and if}ever be scant, I refuse not gold. At the rate of a mark of gold for each six pounds of silver, thou shalt free thy unbelieving carcass from such punishment as thy heart has never even conceived."

"Have mercy on me, noble knight!" exclaimed Isaac; "I am old, and poor, and helpless. It were unworthy to triumph over me. It is a poor deed to crush a worm."

"Old thou mayst be," replied the knight; "more shame to their folly who have suffered thee to grow grey in usury and knavery. Feeble thou mayst be, for when had a Jew either heart or hand? But rich it is well known thou art."

"I swear to you, noble knight," said the Jew, "by all which I believe, and by all which we believe in common——"

"Perjure not thyself," said the Norman, interrupting him, "and let not thine obstinacy seal thy doom, until thou hast seen and well considered the fate that awaits thee. Think not I speak to thee only to excite thy terror, and practise on the base cowardice thou hast derived from thy tribe. I swear to thee by that which thou dost not believe, by the Gospel which our church teaches, and by the keys which are given her to bind and to loose, that my purpose is deep and peremptory. This dungeon is no place for trifling. Prisoners ten thousand times more distinguished than thou have died within these walls, and their fate hath never been known! But for thee is reserved a long and lingering death, to which theirs were luxury."

He again made a signal for the slaves to approach, and spoke to them apart, in their own language; for he also had been in Palestine, where, perhaps, he had learnt his lesson of cruelty. The Saracens produced from their baskets a quantity of charcoal, a pair of bellows, and a flask of oil. While the one struck a light with a flint and steel, the other disposed the charcoal in the large rusty grate which we have already mentioned, and exercised the bellows until the fuel came to a red glow.

"Seest thou, Isaac," said Front-de-Bœuf, "the range of bars above that glowing charcoal? On that warm embers thou shalt lie, stripped of thy clothes as if thou wert cast on a bed of down. One of these slaves shall maintain the fire beneath thee, while the other shall anoint thy soiled limbs with oil, lest the roast should burn. Now, note betwixt such a scorching bed and the payment of a thousand pounds of silver; for, by the head of my father, I have no other option."

"It is impossible," exclaimed the miserable Jew—"it is impossible that your purpose can be real! The good God, nature never made a heart capable of exercising such cruelty!"

"Trust not to that, Isaac," said Front-de-Bœuf, "it were fatal error. Dost thou think that I, who have seen a city sacked, in which thousands of my Christian countrymen perished by sword, by flood, and by fire, will blink my purpose for the outcries or screams of one single accursed Jew? Or thinkest thou that these swarthy slaves, having neither law, country, nor conscience, but their master's will—who use the poison, or the stake, or the sword, or the cord, at his slightest wink—thinkest thou they will have mercy, who do not even understand the language in which it is asked? Be wise, old man; discharge self of a portion of thy superfluous wealth; repay to the lands of a Christian a part of what thou hast acquired by usury thou hast practised on those of his religion. Thy wealth may soon swell out once more thy shrivelled purse, neither leech nor medicine can restore thy scorched hide flesh wert thou once stretched on these bars. Tell thy ransom, I say, and rejoice that at such rate thou dost redeem thee from a dungeon the secrets of which few are returned to tell. I waste no more words with thee: choose between thy dress and thy flesh and blood, and as thou choosest, so shall it be."

"So may Abraham, Jacob, and all the fathers of our people assist me," said Isaac, "I cannot make the choice because I have not the means of satisfying your exorbitant demand!"

"Seize him and strip him, slaves," said the knight, "so let the fathers of his race assist him if they can."

The assistants, taking their directions more from Baron’s eye and his hand than his tongue, once more step forward, laid hands on the unfortunate Isaac, plucked him up from the ground, and, holding him between them, was the hard-hearted Baron’s farther signal. The unhappy Jew eyed their countenances and that of Front-de-Bœuf hope of discovering some symptoms of relenting; but twice of the Baron exhibited the same cold, half-sullen, half cruel smile which had been the prelude to his cruelty;
the savage eyes of the Saracens, rolling gloomily under dark brows, acquiring a yet more sinister expression by whiteness of the circle which surrounds the pupil, evin rather the secret pleasure which they expected from the proaching scene than any reluctance to be its direct agents. The Jew then looked at the glowing furnace which he was presently to be stretched, and seeing no cha of his tormentor’s relenting, his resolution gave way.

"I will pay," he said, "the thousand pounds of sil
That is," he added, after a moment’s pause, "I will pa with the help of my brethren; for I must beg as a me chant at the door of our synagogue ere I make up so unh of a sum. When and where must it be delivered?"

"Here," replied Front-de-Bœuf—"here it must be de ered; weighed it must be—weighed and told down on very dungeon floor. Thinkest thou I will part with until thy ransom is secure?"

"And what is to be my surety," said the Jew, "th shall be at liberty after this ransom is paid?"

"The word of a Norman noble, thou pawnbroker's slave," answered Front-de-Bœuf—"the faith of a No
leman, more pure than the gold and silver of thee and thy tribe."

"I crave pardon, noble lord," said Isaac, timidly, "but before should I rely wholly on the word of one who will nothing to mine?"

"Because thou canst not help it, Jew," said the knight, "Wert thou now in thy treasure-chamber at York, were I craving a loan of thy shekels, it would be thine to state the time of payment and the pledge of security. This is my treasure-chamber. Here I have thee at advance, nor will I again deign to repeat the terms on which I grant thee liberty."

The Jew groaned deeply. "Grant me," he said, "at my own liberty, that of the companions with whom I travel. They scorned me as a Jew, yet they pitied desolation, and because they tarried to aid me by the share of my evil hath come upon them; moreover, they would contribute in some sort to my ransom."

"If thou meanest yonder Saxon churls," said Front-de-Bœuf, "their ransom will depend upon other terms than mine. Mind thine own concerns, Jew, I warn thee, and idle not with those of others."

"I am, then," said Isaac, "only to be set at liberty, together with mine wounded friend?"

"Shall I twice recommend it," said Front-de-Bœuf, "to men of Israel, to meddle with his own concerns, and leave se of others alone? Since thou hast made thy choice, it remains but that thou payest down thy ransom, and that at short day."

"Yet hear me," said the Jew, "for the sake of that very wealth which thou wouldst obtain at the expense of ——" here he stopt short, afraid of irritating the savage man. But Front-de-Bœuf only laughed, and himselfed up the blank at which the Jew had hesitated. "At the expense of my conscience, thou wouldst say, Isaac:"
speak it out—I tell thee, I am reasonable. I can bear the reproaches of a loser, even when that loser is a Jew. Thou wert not so patient, Isaac, when thou didst invoke just ice against Jacques Fitzdotterel, for calling thee a usurious blood-sucker, when thy exactions had devoured his patri-mony.”

“I swear by the Talmud,”1 said the Jew, “that your valour has been misled in that matter. Fitzdotterel drew his poniard upon me in mine own chamber, because I craved him for mine own silver. The term of payment was due at the Passover.”

“I care not what he did,” said Front-de-Bœuf, “the question is, when shall I have mine own?—when shall I have the shekels, Isaac?”

“Let my daughter Rebecca go forth to York,” answered Isaac, “with your safe-conduct, noble knight, and so soon as man and horse can return, the treasure—here he groaned deeply, but added, after the pause of a few seconds: “the treasure shall be told down on this very floor.”

“Thy daughter!” said Front-de-Bœuf, as if surprised, “by heavens, Isaac, I would I had known of this. I deemed that yonder black-browed girl had been thy concubine, and I gave her to be a handmaiden to Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, after the fashion of patriarchs and heroes of the days of old, who set us in these matters a wholesome example.”

The yell which Isaac raised at this unfeeling communication made the very vault to ring, and astounded the two Saracens so much that they let go their hold of the Jew. He availed himself of his enlargement to throw himself on the pavement and clasp the knees of Front-de-Bœuf.

“Take all that you have asked,” said he, “Sir Knight, take ten times more—reduce me to ruin and to beggary, if thou wilt,—nay, pierce me with thy poniard, broil me on that furnace; but spare my daughter, deliver her in safety.

1 TALMUD. The entire body of the Hebrew law, including the exposition by the Rabbis and the religious traditions of the race.
our. As thou art born of woman, spare the honourless maiden. She is the image of my deceased—she is the last of six pledges of her love. Will I live a widowed husband of his sole remaining companion you reduce a father to wish that his only living hope laid beside her dead mother, in the tomb of our God?"

"Said the Norman, somewhat relenting, "that I own of this before. I thought your race had loved to save their money-bags."

"Think not so vilely of us, Jews though we be," said Front-de-Bœuf to improve the moment of apparent sympathy; "the aged fox, the tortured wild-cat loves its young—the Hand of persecution race of Abraham love their children so," said Front-de-Bœuf; "I will believe it in Isaac, for thy very sake. But it aids us not now; I need what has happened, or what is to follow: my word passed to my comrade in arms, nor would I break it to Jews and Jewesses to boot. Besides, why shouldst thou think evil is to come to the girl, even if she became a nobleman's booty?"

"There will—there must!" exclaimed Isaac, wringing his hands in agony; "when did Templars breathe aught but hope and dishonour to women!"

"Of an infidel," said Front-de-Bœuf, with sparkling eyes, "not sorry, perhaps, to seize a pretext for working into a passion, "blaspheme not the Holy Order of the House of Zion, but take thought instead to pay me the thou hast promised, or woe betide thy Jewish name!"

"Said the Jew, retorting the insults of the oppressor with passion, which, however impotent, he did feel impossible to bridle, "I will pay thee nothing, for a silver penny will I pay thee—unless my daughter said to me in safety and honour!"
“Art thou in thy senses, Israelite?” said the Norman, sternly; “has thy flesh and blood a charm against heated iron and scalding oil?”

“I care not!” said the Jew, rendered desperate by paternal affection; “do thy worst. My daughter is my flesh and blood, dearer to me a thousand times than those limbs which thy cruelty threatens. No silver will I give thee, unless I were to pour it molten down thy avaricious throat; no, not a silver penny will I give thee, Nazarene, were it to save thee from the deep damnation thy whole life has merited! Take my life if thou wilt, and say the Jew, amidst his tortures, knew how to disappoint the Christian.”

“We shall see that,” said Front-de-Bœuf; “for by the blessed rood, which is the abomination of thy accursed tribe, thou shalt feel the extremities of fire and steel. Strip him, slaves, and chain him down upon the bars.”

In spite of the feeble struggles of the old man, the Saracens had already torn from him his upper garment, and were proceeding totally to disrobe him, when the sound of a bugle, twice1 wounded without the castle, penetrated even to the recesses of the dungeon, and immediately after loud voices were heard calling for Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf. Unwilling to be found engaged in his hellish occupation, the savage Baron gave the slaves a signal to restore Isaac’s garment, and quitting the dungeon with his attendants, he left the Jew to thank God for his own deliverance, or to lament over his daughter’s captivity and probable fate, as his personal or parental feelings might prove strongest.

1 Twice. Does the author mean thrice? Compare the close of the preceding chapter.
CHAPTER XXIII

Nay, if the gentle spirit of moving words
Can no way change you to a milder form,
I'll woo you, like a soldier, at arms' end,
And love you 'gainst the nature of love, force you.

Two Gentlemen of Verona.

The apartment to which the Lady Rowena had been introduced was fitted up with some rude attempts at ornament and magnificence, and her being placed there might be considered as a peculiar mark of respect not offered to the other prisoners. But the wife of Front-de-Bœuf, for whom it had been originally furnished, was long dead, and decay and neglect had impaired the few ornaments with which her taste had adorned it. The tapestry hung down from the walls in many places, and in others was tarnished and faded under the effects of the sun, or tattered and decayed by age. Desolate, however, as it was, this was the apartment of the castle which had been judged most fitting for the accommodation of the Saxon heiress; and here she was left to meditate upon her fate, until the actors in this nefarious drama had arranged the several parts which each of them was to perform. This had been settled in a council held by Front-de-Bœuf, De Bracy, and the Templar, in which, after a long and warm debate concerning the several advantages which each insisted upon deriving from his peculiar share in this audacious enterprise, they had at length determined the fate of their unhappy prisoners.

It was about the hour of noon, therefore, when De Bracy, for whose advantage the expedition had been first planned, appeared to prosecute his views upon the hands and possessions of the Lady Rowena.
The interval had not entirely been bestowed in council with his confederates, for De Bracy had leisure to decorate his person with all the foppery of times. His green cassock and vizard were now flung back. His long luxuriant hair was trained to flow in quinsy down his richly furred cloak. His beard was closely trimmed, his doublet reached to the middle of his leg, and the girdle which secured it, and at the same time supported the ponderous sword, was embroidered and embossed with work. We have already noticed the extravagant fashion of the shoes at this period, and the points of Maurice de Bracy's might have challenged the prize of extravagance with the gayest, being turned up and twisted like the horns of a stag. Such was the dress of a gallant of the period; and in the present instance, that effect was aided by the handsome person and good demeanour of the wearer, whose deportment partook alike of the grace of a courtier and the frankness of a soldier.

He saluted Rowena by doffing his velvet bonnet enriched with a golden brooch, representing St. Michael trampling down the Prince of Evil. With this, he motioned the lady to a seat and, as she still retained her standing posture, the knight ungloved his right hand and motioned to conduct her thither. But Rowena defied him by her gesture, the proffered compliment, and replied, "I be in the presence of my jailor, Sir Knight—no circumstances allow me to think otherwise—it best be for the prisoner to remain standing till she learns her doom."

"Alas! fair Rowena," returned De Bracy, "you are in the presence of your captive, not your jailor; and it is for me to receive that doom which I fondly expect from him."

"I know you not, sir," said the lady, drawing her head with all the pride of offended rank and beauty—"you not; and the insolent familiarity with which...

1 St. Michael. The archangel; compare Milton's Paradise Lost.
to me the jargon of a troubadour forms no apology for the violence of a robber."

"To thyself, fair maid," answered De Bracy, in his former tone—"to thine own charms be ascribed whate’er I have done which passed the respect due to her whom I have chosen queen of my heart and loadstar of my eyes."

"I repeat to you, Sir Knight, that I know you not, and that no man wearing chain and spurs ought thus to intrude himself upon the presence of an unprotected lady."

"That I am unknown to you," said De Bracy, "is indeed my misfortune; yet let me hope that De Bracy’s name has not been always unspoken when minstrels or heralds have raised deeds of chivalry, whether in the lists or in the battlefield."

"To heralds and to minstrels, then, leave thy praise, Sir Knight," replied Rowena, "more suiting for their mouths than for thine own; and tell me which of them shall record a song, or in book of tourney, the memorable conquest of this night, a conquest obtained over an old man, followed by few timid hinds; and its booty, an unfortunate maiden transported against her will to the castle of a robber?"

"You are unjust, Lady Rowena," said the knight, biting his lips in some confusion, and speaking in a tone more natural to him than that of affected gallantry which he had first adopted; "yourself free from passion, you can allow no excuse for the frenzy of another, although caused by your own beauty."

"I pray you, Sir Knight," said Rowena, "to cease a language so commonly used by strolling minstrels that it becomes not the mouth of knights or nobles. Certes, you constrain me to sit down, since you enter upon such commonplace terms, of which each vile crowder hath a stock that might last from hence to Christmas."

"Proud damsel," said De Bracy, incensed at finding his brilliant style procured him nothing but contempt—"proud Crowder. A player on the crowd, a sort of violin.

damsel, thou shalt be as proudly encountered. Know, then, that I have supported my pretensions to your hand in the way that best suited thy character. It is meet for thy humour to be wooed with bow and bill than in set terms and in courtly language.”

“Courtesy of tongue,” said Rowena, “when it is used to veil churlishness of deed, is but a knight’s girdle around the breast of a base clown. I wonder not that the restraint appears to gall you: more it were for your honour to have retained the dress and language of an outlaw than to veil the deeds of one under an affectation of gentle language and demeanour.”

“You counsel well, lady,” said the Norman; “and in the bold language which best justifies bold action, I tell thee, thou shalt never leave this castle, or thou shalt leave it as Maurice de Bracy’s wife. I am not wont to be baffled in my enterprises, nor needs a Norman noble scrupulously to vindicate his conduct to the Saxon maiden whom he distinguishes by the offer of his hand. Thou art proud, Rowena, and thou art the fitter to be my wife. By what other means couldst thou be raised to high honour and to princely place, saving by my alliance? How else wouldst thou escape from the mean precincts of a country grange, where Saxons herd with the swine which form their wealth, to take thy seat, honoured as thou shouldst be, and shalt be, amid all in England that is distinguished by beauty or dignified by power?”

“Sir Knight,” replied Rowena, “the grange which you contemn hath been my shelter from infancy; and, trust me, when I leave it—should that day ever arrive—it shall be with one who has not learnt to despise the dwelling and manners in which I have been brought up.”

“I guess your meaning, lady,” said De Bracy, “though you may think it lies too obscure for my apprehension. But dream not that Richard Coeur-de-Lion will ever resee thone, far less that Wilfred of Ivanhoe, his minion, ever lead thee to his footstool, to be there welcomed as bride of a favourite. Another suitor might feel jealousy while he touched this string; but my firm purpose not be changed by a passion so childish and so hopeless. Now, lady, that this rival is in my power, and that it rests with me to betray the secret of his being within the ile to Front-de-Bœuf, whose jealousy will be more fatal mine."

"Wilfred here!" said Rowena, in disdain; "that is as true that Front-de-Bœuf is his rival."

De Bracy looked at her steadily for an instant. "Wert a really ignorant of this?" said he; "didst thou not know: Wilfred of Ivanhoe travelled in the litter of the Jew? meet conveyance for the crusader whose doughty arm to reconquer the Holy Sepulchre!" And he laughed merrily.

"And if he is here," said Rowena, compelling herself to one of indifference, though trembling with an agony of rehension which she could not suppress, "in what is he rival of Front-de-Bœuf? or what has he to fear beyond a ort imprisonment and an honourable ransom, according he use of chivalry?"

"Rowena," said De Bracy, "art thou, too, deceived by common error of thy sex, who think there can be no dry but that respecting their own charms? Knowest u not there is a jealousy of ambition and of wealth, as I as of love; and that this our host, Front-de-Bœuf, will th from his road him who opposes his claim to the fair ony of Ivanhoe as readily, eagerly, and unscrupulously if he were preferred to him by some blue-eyed damsels? t smile on my suit, lady, and the wounded champion shall ge nothing to fear from Front-de-Bœuf, whom else thou yet mourn for, as in the hands of one who has never rm compassion."

“Save him, for the love of Heaven!” said Rowena, her firmness giving way under terror for her lover’s impending fate.

“I can—I will—it is my purpose,” said De Bracy; “for, when Rowena consents to be the bride of De Bracy, who shall dare to put forth a violent hand upon her kinsman—the son of her guardian—the company of her youth? But it is thy love must buy his protection. I am not romantic fool enough to further the fortune, or avert the fate, of one who is likely to be a successful obstacle between me and my wishes. Use thine influence with me in his behalf, and he is safe; refuse to employ it, Wilfred dies, and thou thyself art not the nearer to freedom.”

“Thy language,” answered Rowena, “hath in its indifferent bluntness something which cannot be reconciled with the horrors it seems to express. I believe not that thy purpose is so wicked, or thy power so great.”

“Flatter thyself, then, with that belief,” said De Bracy, “until time shall prove it false. Thy lover lies wounded in this castle—thy preferred lover. He is a bar betwixt Front-de-Bœuf and that which Front-de-Bœuf loves better than either ambition or beauty. What will it cost beyond the blow of a poniard, or the thrust of a javelin, to silence his opposition for ever? Nay, were Front-de-Bœuf afraid to justify a deed so open, let the leech but give his patient a wrong draught, let the chamberlain, or the nurse who tends him, but pluck the pillow from his head, and Wilfred, in his present condition, is sped without the effusion of blood. Cedric also—”

“And Cedric also,” said Rowena, repeating his words—“my noble—my generous guardian! I deserved the evil I have encountered, for forgetting his fate even in that of his son!”

“Cedric’s fate also depends upon thy determination,” said De Bracy, “and I leave thee to form it.”

Hitherto, Rowena had sustained her part in this trying scene with undismayed courage, but it was because she had not considered the danger as serious and imminent. Her disposition was naturally that which physiognomists consider as proper to fair complexions—mild, timid, and gentle; but it had been tempered, and, as it were, hardened, by the circumstances of her education. Accustomed to see the will of all, even of Cedric himself—sufficiently arbitrary with others—give way before her wishes, she had acquired that sort of courage and self-confidence which arises from the habitual and constant deference of the circle in which we move. She could scarce conceive the possibility of her will being opposed, far less that of its being treated with total disregard.

Her haughtiness and habit of domination was, therefore, a fictitious character, induced over that which was natural to her, and it deserted her when her eyes were opened to the extent of her own danger, as well as that of her lover and her guardian; and when she found her will, the slightest expression of which was wont to command respect and attention, now placed in opposition to that of a man of a strong, fierce, and determined mind, who possessed the advantage over her, and was resolved to use it, she quailed before him.

After casting her eyes around, as if to look for the aid which was nowhere to be found, and after a few broken interjections, she raised her hands to heaven, and burst into a passion of uncontrolled vexation and sorrow. It was impossible to see so beautiful a creature in such extremity without feeling for her, and De Bracy was not unmoved, though he was yet more embarrassed than touched. He had, in truth, gone too far to recede; and yet, in Rowena's present condition, she could not be acted on either by argument or threats. He paced the apartment to and fro, now vainly exhorting the terrified maiden to compose herself, now hesitating concerning his own line of conduct.

"If," thought he, "I should be moved by the tears and sorrow of this disconsolate damsel, what should I reap but the loss of those fair hopes for which I have encountered so much risk, and the ridicule of Prince John and his jovial comrades. And yet,” he said to himself, “I feel myself ill framed for the part which I am playing. I cannot look on so fair a face while it is disturbed with agony, or on those eyes when they are drowned in tears. I would she had retained her original haughtiness of disposition, or that I had a larger share of Front-de-Bœuf’s thrice-tempered hardness of heart!”

Agitated by these thoughts, he could only bid the unfortunate Rowena be comforted, and assure her that as yet she had no reason for the excess of despair to which she was now giving way. But in this task of consolation De Bracy was interrupted by the horn, “hoarse-winded blowing far and keen,” which had at the same time alarmed the other inmates of the castle, and interrupted their several plans of avarice and of license. Of them all, perhaps, De Bracy least regretted the interruption; for his conference with the Lady Rowena had arrived at a point where he found it equally difficult to prosecute or to resign his enterprise.

And here we cannot but think it necessary to offer some better proof than the incidents of an idle tale to vindicate the melancholy representation of manners which has been just laid before the reader. It is grievous to think that those valiant barons, to whose stand against the crown the liberties of England were indebted for their existence, should themselves have been such dreadful oppressors, and capable of excesses contrary not only to the laws of England, but to those of nature and humanity. But, alas! we have only to extract from the industrious Henry¹ one of those numerous passages which he has collected from contemporary historians, to prove that fiction itself can hardly reach the dark reality of the horrors of the period.

Scott refers the following extract to volume VII., page 348 of the edition of 1805.
The description given by the author of the Saxon Chronicle of the cruelties exercised in the reign of King Stephen by the great barons and lords of castles, who were fit Normans, affords a strong proof of the excesses of which they were capable when their passions were inflamed. They grievously oppressed the poor people by building castles; and when they were built, they filled them with wicked men, or rather devils, who seized both men and women who they imagined had any money, threw them into prison, and put them to more cruel tortures than the mar- rys ever endured. They suffocated some in mud, and suspended others by the feet, or the head, or the thumbs, indling fires below them. They squeezed the heads of some with knotted cords till they pierced their brains, while they threw others into dungeons swarming with serpents, nakes, and toads.” But it would be cruel to put the reader to the pain of perusing the remainder of this description.

As another instance of these bitter fruits of conquest, and perhaps the strongest that can be quoted, we may mention, that the Empress Matilda, though a daughter of the King of Scotland, and afterwards both Queen of England and Empress of Germany, the daughter, the wife, and the mother of monarchs, was obliged, during her early residence for education in England, to assume the veil of a nun, as the only means of escaping the licentious pursuit of the Norman nobles. This excuse she stated before a great council of the clergy of England, as the sole reason for her having taken the religious habit. The assembled clergy admitted the validity of the plea, and the notoriety of the circumstances upon which it was founded; giving thus an indubitable and most remarkable testimony to the existence of that disgraceful license by which that age was stained. It was a matter of public knowledge, they said, that after the conquest of King William, his Norman followers, elated by so great a victory, acknowledged no law but their own wicked pleasure, and not only despoiled the conquered.
Saxons of their lands and their goods, but invaded honour of their wives and of their daughters with the unbridled license; and hence it was then common matrons and maidens of noble families to assume the and take shelter in convents, not as called thither by vocation of God, but solely to preserve their honour fr
the unbridled wickedness of man.

Such and so licentious were the times, as announced the public declaration of the assembled clergy, recorded Eadmer; and we need add nothing more to vindicate probability of the scenes which we have detailed, and about to detail, upon the more apocryphal authority of Wardour MS.

1 EADMER. A monk, author of the Historia Novorum (1066-1122).
CHAPTER XXIV

I'll woo her as the lion woos his bride.

Douglas.

While the scenes we have described were passing in her parts of the castle, the Jewess Rebecca awaited her in a distant and sequestered turret. Hither she had been led by two of her disguised ravishers, and on being rust into the little cell, she found herself in the presence of an old sibyl, who kept murmuring to herself a Saxon rhyme, as if to beat time to the revolving dance which her indle was performing upon the floor. The hag raised her head as Rebecca entered, and scowled at the fair Jewess with the malignant envy with which old age and ugliness, when united with evil conditions, are apt to look upon youth and beauty.

"Thou must up and away, old house-cricket," said one of the men; "our noble master commands it. Thou must leave this chamber to a fairer guest."

"Ay," grumbled the hag, "even thus is service requited. I have known when my bare word would have cast the best in-at-arms among ye out of saddle and out of service; and now must I up and away at the command of every groom as thou."

"Good Dame Urfrid," said the other man, "stand not to reason on it, but up and away. Lords' hests must be attended to with a quick ear. Thou hast had thy day, old one, but thy sun has long been set. Thou art now the emblem of an old war-horse turned out on the barren th; thou hast had thy paces in thy time, but now a broken amble is the best of them. Come, amble off with thee."

"Ill omens dog ye both!" said the old woman; "and a kennel be your burying-place! May the evil demon Zernebock\(^1\) tear me limb from limb, if I leave my own cell ere I have spun out the hemp on my distaff!"

"Answer it to our lord, then, old house-fiend," said the man, and retired, leaving Rebecca in company with the old woman, upon whose presence she had been thus unwillingly forced.

"What devil's deed have they now in the wind?" said the old hag, murmuring to herself, yet from time to time casting a sidelong and malignant glance at Rebecca; "but it is easy to guess. Bright eyes, black locks, and a skin like paper,\(^2\) ere the priest stains it with his black unguent! Ay, it is easy to guess why they send her to this lone turret, whence a shriek could no more be heard than at the depth of five hundred fathoms beneath the earth. Thou wilt have owls for thy neighbours, fair one; and their screams will be heard as far, and as much regarded, as thine own. Outlandish, too," she said, marking the dress and turban of Rebecca. "What country art thou of—a Saracen or an Egyptian? Why dost not answer? Thou canst weep, canst thou not speak?"

"Be not angry, good mother," said Rebecca.

"Thou needst say no more," replied Urfrid; "men know a fox by the train,\(^3\) and a Jewess by her tongue."

"For the sake of mercy," said Rebecca, "tell me what I am to expect as the conclusion of the violence which hath dragged me hither! Is it my life they seek, to atone for my religion? I will lay it down cheerfully."

"Thy life, minion!" answered the sibyl: "what would taking thy life pleasure them? Trust me, thy life is in no

\(^{1}\) Zernebock. In Slavic mythology, a demon.

\(^{2}\) Paper. When was paper introduced?

\(^{3}\) Train. Tail.
Such usage shalt thou have as was once thought good enough for a noble Saxon maiden. And shall a Jew's like thee repine because she hath no better? Look at me. I was as young and twice as fair as thou, when Front-Bœuf, father of this Reginald, and his Normans, stormed this castle. My father and his seven sons defended their inheritance from story to story, from chamber to chamber. There was not a room, not a step of the stair, that was not slippery with their blood. They died—they died every one; and ere their bodies were cold, and ere their blood was dried, I had become the prey and the scorn of the conqueror!"

"Is there no help? Are there no means of escape?" said Rebecca. "Richly—richly would I requite thine aid."

"Think not of it," said the hag; "from hence there is no escape but through the gates of death; and it is late—late," she added, shaking her grey head, "ere these open to us. Yet it is comfort to think that we leave behind us on earth those who shall be wretched as ourselves. Fare thee well, wench! Jew or Gentile, thy fate would be the same; for thou hast to do with them that have neither scruple nor pity. Fare thee well, I say. My thread is spun out; thy work is yet to begin."

"Stay! stay! for Heaven's sake!" said Rebecca—"stay, though it be to curse and to revile me; thy presence is yet my protection."

"The presence of the mother of God were no protection," answered the old woman. "There she stands," pointing to a rude image of the Virgin Mary, "see if she can avert the fate that awaits thee."

She left the room as she spoke, her features wrenched into a sort of sneering laugh, which made them seem even more devious than their habitual frown. She locked the door behind her, and Rebecca might hear her curse every step for steepness, as slowly and with difficulty she descended the secret stair.
Rebecca was now to expect a fate even more dreadful than that of Rowena; for what probability was there that either softness or ceremony would be used towards one of her oppressed race, whatever shadow of these might be preserved towards a Saxon heiress? Yet had the Jewess this advantage, that she was better prepared by habits of thought, and by natural strength of mind, to encounter the dangers to which she was exposed. Of a strong and observing character, even from her earliest years, the pomp and wealth which her father displayed within his walls, or which she witnessed in the houses of other wealthy Hebrews, had not been able to blind her to the precarious circumstances under which they were enjoyed. Like Damocles\(^1\) at his celebrated banquet, Rebecca perpetually beheld, amid that gorgeous display, the sword which was suspended over the heads of her people by a single hair. These reflections had tamed and brought down to a pitch of sounder judgment a temper which, under other circumstances, might have waxed haughty, supercilious, and obstinate.

From her father’s example and injunctions, Rebecca had learnt to bear herself courteously towards all who approached her. She could not indeed imitate his excess of subservience, because she was a stranger to the meanness of mind and to the constant state of timid apprehension by which it was dictated; but she bore herself with a proud humility, as if submitting to the evil circumstances in which she was placed as the daughter of a despised race, while she felt in her mind the consciousness that she was entitled to hold a higher rank from her merit than the arbitrary despotism of religious prejudice permitted her to aspire to.

Thus prepared to expect adverse circumstances, she had acquired the firmness necessary for acting under them. Her present situation required all her presence of mind, and she summoned it up accordingly.

\(^1\text{Damocles. For the story of Damocles and his suspended sword, see any manual of Greek mythology.}\) her first care was to inspect the apartment; but it held few hopes either of escape or protection. It contained neither secret passage nor trap-door, and, unless the door by which she had entered joined the main hall, seemed to be circumscribed by the round exterior of the turret. The door had no inside bolt or bar. A single window opened upon an embattled space surronding the turret, which gave Rebecca, at first sight, hopes of escaping; but she soon found it had no connection with any other part of the battlements, being an embrasure, or balcony, secured, as usual, by a parapet, at which a few archers might be stationed fending the turret, and flanking with their shot the castle on that side.

There was therefore no hope but in passive fortitude, strong reliance on Heaven natural to great and good characters. Rebecca, however erroneously taught to interpret the promises of Scripture to the chosen people, did not err in supposing the present to be their day called in with the fulness of the Gentiles. In an hour, all around her showed that their present was that of punishment and probation, and that it was special duty to suffer without sinning. Thus pre- to consider herself as the victim of misfortune, Rebecca had early reflected upon her own state, and schooled and to meet the dangers which she had probably to enter.

The prisoner trembled, however, and changed colour, a step was heard on the stair, and the door of the chamber slowly opened, and a tall man, dressed as those banditti to whom they owed their misfortune, entered, and shut the door behind him; his cap, down upon his brows, concealed the upper part of his face. In this guise, as if prepared for the execution of some deed, at the thought of which he was himself ashamed, he stood before the affrighted prisoner; yet, ruffian as his dress bespoke him, he seemed at a loss to express what purpose had brought him thither, so that Rebecca, making an effort upon herself, had time to anticipate his explanation. She had already unclasped two costly bracelets and a collar, which she hastened to proffer to the supposed outlaw, concluding naturally that to gratify his avarice was to bespeak his favour.

"Take these," she said, "good friend, and for God's sake be merciful to me and my aged father. These ornaments are of value, yet are they trifling to what he would bestow to obtain our dismissal from this castle free and uninjured."

"Fair flower of Palestine," replied the outlaw, "these pearls are orient, but they yield in whiteness to your teeth; the diamonds are brilliant, but they cannot match your eyes; and ever since I have taken up this wild trade, I have made a vow to prefer beauty to wealth."

"Do not do yourself such wrong," said Rebecca; "take ransom, and have mercy! Gold will purchase you pleasure; to misuse us could only bring thee remorse. My father will willingly satiate thy utmost wishes; and if thou wilt act wisely, thou mayst purchase with our spoils thy restoration to civil society—mayst obtain pardon for past errors, and be placed beyond the necessity of committing more."

"It is well spoken," replied the outlaw in French, finding it difficult probably to sustain in Saxon a conversation which Rebecca had opened in that language; "but know, bright lily of the vale of Baca that thy father is already in the hands of a powerful alchemist, who knows how to convert into gold and silver even the rusty bars of a dungeon grate. The venerable Isaac is subjected to an alembic.

---

1. ORIENT. The word means east, but as applied to gems, has the sense of precious. Compare Tennyson's fine phrase in The Princess, Prologue, "laborious orient ivory."

2. VALE OF BACA. See Psalms LXXXIV. 6. These and the frequent expressions of similar nature are characteristic oriental terms of endearment familiar to both Rebecca and the Templar.
which will distil from him all he holds dear, without any resistance from my requests or thy entreaty. Thy ransom must be paid by love and beauty, and in no other coin will I accept it."

"Thou art no outlaw," said Rebecca, in the same language in which he addressed her; "no outlaw had refused such offers. No outlaw in this land uses the dialect in which thou hast spoken. Thou art no outlaw, but a Norman—a Norman, noble perhaps in birth. Oh, be so in thy actions, and cast off this fearful mask of outrage and violence!"

"And thou, who canst guess so truly," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, dropping the mantle from his face, "art no true daughter of Israel, but in all save youth and beauty, every witch of Endor. I am not an outlaw then, fair rose of Sharon. And I am one who will be more prompt to hang my neck and arms with pearls and diamonds, which so well become them, than to deprive thee of these ornaments."

"What wouldst thou have of me," said Rebecca, "if not my wealth? We can have nought in common between us; thou art a Christian, I am a Jewess. Our union were contrary to the laws alike of the church and the synagogue."

"It were so, indeed," replied the Templar, laughing. Wed with a Jewess! Despardieux! Not if she were the queen of Sheba! And know, besides, sweet daughter of lion, that were the most Christian king to offer me his most Christian daughter, with Languedoc for a dowry, I could not wed her. It is against my vow to love any maiden, otherwise than par amours, as I will love thee. I am a Templar. Behold the cross of my holy order."

"Darest thou appeal to it," said Rebecca, "on an occasion like the present?"

---

1 Despardieux. A French oath: "in God's name!"
2 Most Christian King. A title assumed by the Kings of France.
3 Languedoc. See note, page 243.
4 Par amours. From which is derived our word paramour, an illicit love.
“And if I do so,” said the Templar, “it concerns not thee, who art no believer in the blessed sign of our salvation.”

“I believe as my fathers taught,” said Rebecca; “and may God forgive my belief if erroneous! But you, Sir Knight, what is yours, when you appeal without scruple to that which you deem most holy, even while you are about to transgress the most solemn of your vows as a knight and as a man of religion?”

“It is gravely and well preached, O daughter of Sirach!” answered the Templar; “but, gentle Ecclesiastica, thy narrow Jewish prejudices make thee blind to our high privilege. Marriage were an enduring crime on the part of a Templar; but what lesser folly I may practise, I shall speedily be absolved from at the next preceptory of our order. Not the wisest of monarchs, not his father, whose examples you must needs allow are weighty, claimed wider privileges than we poor soldiers of the Temple of Zion have won by our zeal in its defence. The protectors of Solomon’s temple may claim license by the example of Solomon.”

“If thou readest the Scripture,” said the Jewess, “and the lives of the saints, only to justify thine own license and profligacy, thy crime is like that of him who extracts poison from the most healthful and necessary herbs.”

The eyes of the Templar flashed fire at this reproof. “Hearken,” he said, “Rebecca; I have hitherto spoken mildly to thee, but now my language shall be that of a conqueror. Thou art the captive of my bow and spear, subject to my will by the laws of all nations; nor will I abate an inch of my right, or abstain from taking by violence what thou refusest to entreaty or necessity.”

1 Ecclesiastica. Feminine form of Ecclesiasticus, the title of the Book of Wisdom, one of the sacred books of the Hebrews, not included in the Protestant Bible. It contains the Proverbs of Jesus, the son of Sirach.

2 Preceptory. The organized assembly of the superiors of the order, who were called preceptors.
“Stand back,” said Rebecca—“stand back, and hear me, thou offerest to commit a sin so deadly! My strength mayst indeed overpower, for God made women weak, and trusted their defence to man’s generosity. But I will proclaim thy villainy, Templar, from one end of Europe to the other. I will owe to the superstition of thy brethren that their compassion might refuse me. Each preceptory—each chapter of thy order, shall learn that, like a heretic, thou hast sinned with a Jewess. Those who tremble not at thy crime will hold thee accursed for having so far disdained the cross thou wearest as to follow a daughter of thy people.”

“Thou art keen-witted, Jewess,” replied the Templar, well aware of the truth of what she spoke, and that the rules of his order condemned in the most positive manner, and under high penalties, such intrigues as he now prosecuted, and that in some instances even degradation had followed upon it—“thou art sharp-witted,” he said; “but loud must be thy voice of complaint if it is heard beyond the iron walls of this castle; within these, murmurs, laments, appeals to justice, and screams for help die alike silent away. One thing only can save thee, Rebecca. Submit to thy fate, embrace our religion, and thou shalt go forth in such state that many a Norman lady shall yield as well in pomp as in beauty to the favourite of the best lance among the defenders of the Temple.”

“Submit to my fate!” said Rebecca; “and, sacred Heaven! to what fate? Embrace thy religion! and what religion can it be that harbours such a villain? Thou the last lance of the Templars! Craven knight!—forsworn priest! I spit at thee and I defy thee. The God of Abraham’s promise hath opened an escape to his daughter—even from this abyss of infamy!”

As she spoke, she threw open the latticed window which led to the bartizan, and in an instant after stood on the very verge of the parapet, with not the slightest screen between... her and the tremendous depth below. Unprepared for such a desperate effort, for she had hitherto stood perfectly motionless, Bois-Guilbert had neither time to intercept nor to stop her. As he offered to advance, she exclaimed, " Remain where thou art, proud Templar, or at thy choice advance!—one foot nearer, and I plunge myself from the precipice; my body shall be crushed out of the very form of humanity upon the stones of that courtyard ere it become the victim of thy brutality!"

As she spoke this, she clasped her hands and extended them towards heaven, as if imploring mercy on her soul before she made the final plunge. The Templar hesitated, and a resolution which had never yielded to pity or distress gave way to his admiration of her fortitude. "Come down," he said, "rash girl! I swear by earth, and sea, and sky, I will offer thee no offence."

"I will not trust thee, Templar," said Rebecca; "thou hast taught me better how to estimate the virtues of thine order. The next preceptory would grant thee absolution for an oath the keeping of which concerned nought but the honour or the dishonour of a miserable Jewish maiden."

"You do me injustice," exclaimed the Templar, fervently; "I swear to you by the name which I bear—by the cross on my bosom—by the sword on my side—by the ancient crest of my fathers do I swear, I will do thee no injury whatsoever! If not for thyself, yet for thy father's sake forbear! I will be his friend, and in this castle he will need a powerful one."

"Alas!" said Rebecca, "I know it but too well. Dare I trust thee?"

"May my arms be reversed and my name dishonoured," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, "if thou shalt have reason to complain of me! Many a law, many a commandment have I broken, but my word never."

"I will then trust thee," said Rebecca, "thus far; and

---

Crest. Heraldic device or emblem of the house.
cended from the verge of the battlement, but re-standing close by one of the embrasures, or machises they were then called. "Here," she said, "I take ad. Remain where thou art, and if thou shalt at-not diminish by one step the distance now between us, alt see that the Jewish maiden will rather trust her with God than her honour to the Templar!"
while Rebecca spoke thus, her high and firm resolve, corresponded so well with the expressive beauty of mien, gave to her looks, air, and manner a dig-and seemed more than mortal. Her glance quailed
s cheek blanched not, for the fear of a fate so instant horrible; on the contrary, the thought that she had at her command, and could escape at will from in-death, gave a yet deeper colour of carnation to her ion, and a yet more brilliant fire to her eye. Bois-got, proud himself and high-spirited, thought he had eld beauty so animated and so commanding.
not there be peace between us, Rebecca," he said.
ace, if thou wilt," answered Rebecca—"peace; but is space between."
you needst no longer fear me," said Bois-Guilbert.
fear thee not," replied she, "thanks to him that his dizzy tower so high that nought could fall from
we. Thanks to him, and to the God of Israel! I fear not."
you dost me injustice," said the Templar; "by earth,
I sky, thou dost me injustice! I am not naturally ich you have seen me—hard, selfish, and relentless.
oman that taught me cruelty, and on woman there-evolved exercised it; but not upon such as thou. Hear becca. Never did knight take lance in his hand with more devoted to the lady of his love than Brian de gilbert. She, the daughter of a petty baron, who for all his domains but a ruinous tower and an un-ive vineyard, and some few leagues of the barren Landes of Bordeaux, her name was known wherever deeds of arms were done, known wider than that of many a lady’s that had a county for a dowry. Yes,” he continued, pacing up and down the little platform, with an animation in which he seemed to lose all consciousness of Rebecca’s presence—“yes, my deeds, my danger, my blood made the name of Adelaide de Montemare known from the court of Castile to that of Byzantium. And how was I requited? When I returned with my dear-bought honours purchased by toil and blood, I found her wedded to a Gascon squire, whose name was never heard beyond the limits of his own paltry domain! Truly did I love her, and bitterly did I revenge me of her broken faith! But my vengeance has recoiled on myself. Since that day I have separated myself from life and its ties. My manhood must know no domestic home, must be soothed by no affectionate wife. My age must know no kindly hearth. My grave must be solitary, and no offspring must outlive me, to bear the ancient name of Bois-Guilbert. At the feet of my superior I have laid down the right of self-action—the privilege of independence. The Templar, a serf in all but the name, can possess neither lands nor goods, and lives, moves, and breathes but at the will and pleasure of another.”

“Alas!” said Rebecca, “what advantages could compensate for such an absolute sacrifice?”

“The power of vengeance, Rebecca,” replied the Templar, “and the prospects of ambition.”

“An evil recompense,” said Rebecca, “for the surrender of the rights which are dearest to humanity.”

“Say not so, maiden,” answered the Templar; “revenge is a feast for the gods! And if they have reserved it, as priests tell us, to themselves, it is because they hold it an enjoyment too precious for the possession of mere mortals. And ambition! it is a temptation which could disturb even

1 Landes. Tracts of barren waste and woodland which give the name to one of the districts or departments of southern France. The district is thinly peopled and is one of the dreariest regions in Europe.
of Heaven itself.” He paused a moment, and then Rebecca! she who could prefer death to dishonour a proud and a powerful soul. Mine thou must, start not,” he added, “it must be with thine own and on thine own terms. Thou must consent to me hopes more extended than can be viewed the throne of a monarch! Hear me ere you answer, ere you refuse. The Templar loses, as thou hast social rights, his power of free agency, but he be-member and a limb of a mighty body, before which already tremble—even as the single drop of rain exes with the sea becomes an individual part of that ocean which undermines rocks and ingulphs royal. Such a swelling flood is that powerful league, mighty order I am no mean member, but already one chief commanders, and may well aspire one day to batoon of Grand Master. The poor soldiers of the will not alone place their foot upon the necks of hemp-sandall’d monk can do that. Our mailed I ascend their throne, our gauntlet shall wrench the from their gripe. Not the reign of your vainly-Messiah offers such power to your dispersed tribes ambition may aim at. I have sought but a kindred share it, and I have found such in thee.”

“Bethink thee——”

“Answer me not,” said the Templar, “by urging the of our creeds; within our secret conclaves we hold nursery tales in derision. Think not we long re-blind to the idiotical folly of our founders, who every delight of life for the pleasure of dying mar- hunger, by thirst, and by pestilence, and by the

---

8. A Spanish word meaning “war-fleets.” What is the history of rmada?
9. Baton; a staff of office.
Ambition, etc. What was the “ambition” of the Templar and swords of savages, while they vainly strove to defend a barren desert, valuable only in the eyes of superstition. Our order soon adopted bolder and wider views, and found out a better indemnification for our sacrifices. Our immense possessions in every kingdom of Europe, our high military fame, which brings within our circle the flower of chivalry from every Christian clime—these are dedicated to ends of which our pious founders little dreamed, and which are equally concealed from such weak spirits as embrace our order on the ancient principles, and whose superstition makes them our passive tools. But I will not further withdraw the veil of our mysteries. That bugle-sound announces something which may require my presence. Think on what I have said. Farewell! I do not say forgive me the violence I have threatened, for it was necessary to the display of thy character. Gold can be only known by the application of the touchstone. I will soon return, and hold further conference with thee."

He re-entered the turret-chamber, and descended the stair, leaving Rebecca scarcely more terrified at the prospect of the death to which she had been so lately exposed, than at the furious ambition of the bold bad man in whose power she found herself so unhappily placed. When she entered the turret-chamber, her first duty was to return thanks to the God of Jacob for the protection which He had afforded her, and to implore its continuance for her and for her father. Another name glided into her petition; it was that of the wounded Christian, whom fate had placed in the hands of bloodthirsty men, his avowed enemies. Her heart indeed checked her, as if, even in communing with the Deity in prayer, she mingled in her devotions the recollection of one with whose fate hers could have no alliance—a Nazarene, and an enemy to her faith. But the petition was already breathed, nor could all the narrow prejudices of her sect induce Rebecca to wish it recalled.
CHAPTER XXV.

...'d cramp piece of penmanship as ever I saw in my life! She Stoops to Conquer.

When the Templar reached the hall of the castle, he found De Bracy already there. "Your love-suit," said De Bracy, "hath, I suppose, been disturbed, like mine, by this pernicious summons. But you have come later and more pleasantly, and therefore I presume your interview has been more agreeable than mine."

Has your suit, then, been unsuccessfully paid to the heiress?" said the Templar.

By the bones of Thomas a Becket," answered De Bracy, "the Lady Rowena must have heard that I cannot bear the sight of women’s tears."

Away!" said the Templar; "thou a leader of a Free Company, and regard a woman’s tears! A few drops splashed on the torch of love make the flame blaze the hotter."

"Barmecide for the few drops of thy sprinkling," replied De Bracy; "but this damsel hath wept enough to extinguish the conflagration. Never was such wringing of hands and overflowing of eyes, since the days of St. Niobe,¹ of whom Prior Aymer told us. A water-fiend hath possessed our Saxon."

A legion of fiends have occupied the bosom of the Jew—replied the Templar; "for I think no single one, not Apollyon² himself, could have inspired such indomita-

¹ Niobe. I wish the prior had also informed them when Niobe was a Saxon. Probably during that enlightened period when "Pun to Moses lent his pagan horn."—L. T. [Scott.]

² Apollyon. One of Satan’s angels; he appears as one of the characters in John Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress.
able pride and resolution. But where is Front-de-Bœuf? That horn is sounded more and more clamorously."

"He is negotiating with the Jew, I suppose," replied De Bracy, coolly; "probably the howls of Isaac have drowned the blast of the bugle. Thou mayst know, by experience, Sir Brian, that a Jew parting with his treasures on such terms as our friend Front-de-Bœuf is like to offer will raise a clamour loud enough to be heard over twenty horns and trumpets to boot. But we will make the vassals call him."

They were soon after joined by Front-de-Bœuf, who had been disturbed in his tyrannic cruelty in the manner with which the reader is acquainted, and had only tarried to give some necessary directions. "Let us see the cause of this cursed clamour," said Front-de-Bœuf; "here is a letter, and, if I mistake not, it is in Saxon."

He looked at it, turning it round and round as if he had had really some hopes of coming at the meaning by inverting the position of the paper, and then handed it to De Bracy.

"It may be magic spells for aught I know," said De Bracy, who possessed his full proportion of the ignorance which characterised the chivalry of the period. "Our chaplain attempted to teach me to write," he said, "but all my letters were formed like spear-heads and sword-blades, and so the old shaveling gave up the task."

"Give it me," said the Templar. "We have that of the priestly character, that we have some knowledge to enlighten our valour."

"Let us profit by your most reverend knowledge, then," said De Bracy; "what says the scroll?"

"It is a formal letter of defiance," answered the Templar; "but, by our Lady of Bethlehem, if it be not a foolish jest, it is the most extraordinary cartel that ever was sent across the drawbridge of a baronial castle."

1 Cartel, A formal challenge.
"Jest!" said Front-de-Bœuf, "I would gladly know who jest with me in such a matter. Read it, Sir Brian."

The Templar accordingly read it as follows:

"I, Wamba, the son of Witless, jester to a noble and freeborn man, Cedric of Rotherwood, called the Saxon: and I, Gurth, the son of Beowulph, the swineherd——"

"Thou art mad," said Front-de-Bœuf, interrupting the reader.

"By St. Luke, it is so set down," answered the Templar. When resuming his task, he went on—"I, Gurth, the son of Beowulph, swineherd unto the said Cedric, with the assistance of our allies and confederates, who make common cause with us in this our feud, namely, the good knight, called for the present Le Noir Faineant, and the stout yeoman, Robert Locksley, called Cleave-the-Wand, to you, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, and your allies and accomplices homsoever, to wit, that whereas you have, without cause given or feud declared, wrongfully and by mastery seized upon the person of our lord and master the said Cedric; so upon the person of a noble and freeborn damsel, the lady Rowena of Hargottstandstede; also upon the person of a noble and freeborn man, Athelstane of Coningsburgh; so upon the persons of certain freeborn men, their cnichts; so upon certain serfs, their born bondsmen; also upon a certain Jew, named Isaac of York, together with his daughter, a Jewess, and certain horses and mules: which noble persons, with their cnichts and slaves, and also with the horses and mules, Jew and Jewess before-foresaid, were all in fact with his Majesty, and travelling as liege subjects upon the king's highway; therefore we require and demand that the said noble persons, namely, Cedric of Rotherwood, Rowena of Hargottstandstede, Athelstane of Coningsburgh, with their servants, cnichts, and followers, also the horses and mules, Jew and Jewess aforesaid, together with all goods and chattels to them pertaining, be, within an hour..."
after the delivery hereof, delivered to us, or to those whom we shall appoint to receive the same, and that untouched and unharmed in body and goods. Failing of which, we do pronounce to you, that we hold ye as robbers and traitors, and will wager our bodies against ye in battle, siege, or otherwise, and do our utmost to your annoyance and destruction. Wherefore may God have you in His keeping. Signed by us upon the eve of St. Withold’s day, under the great trysting oak in the Harthill Walk, the above being written by a holy man, clerk to God, our Lady, and St. Dunstan, in the chapel of Copmanhurst."

At the bottom of this document was scrawled, in the first place, a rude sketch of a cock’s head and comb, with a legend expressing this hieroglyphic to be the sign-manual of Wamba, son of Witless. Under this respectable emblem stood a cross, stated to be the mark of Gurth, the son of Beowulph. Then was written, in rough bold characters, the words Le Noir Faineant. And, to conclude the whole, an arrow, neatly enough drawn, was described as the mark of the yeoman Locksley.

The knights heard this uncommon document read from end to end, and then gazed upon each other in silent amaze- ment, as being utterly at a loss to know what it could pretend. De Bracy was the first to break silence by an uncon- trollable fit of laughter, wherein he was joined, though with more moderation, by the Templar. Front-de-Bœuf, on the contrary, seemed impatient of their ill-timed jocularity.

“I give you plain warning,” he said, “fair sirs, that you had better consult how to bear yourselves under these circumstances than give way to such misplaced merriment.”

“Front-de-Bœuf has not recovered his temper since his late overthrow,” said De Bracy to the Templar; “he is cowed at the very idea of a cartel, though it come but from a fool and a swineherd.”

“By St. Michael,” answered Front-de-Bœuf, “I would thou couldst stand the whole brunt of this adventure thy-
f. De Bracy. These fellows dared not have acted with such inconceivable impudence, had they not been supported some strong bands. There are enough of outlaws in this nest to resent my protecting the deer. I did but tie one low, who was taken red-handed and in the fact, to the horns of a wild stag, which gored him to death in five minutes, and I had as many arrows shot at me as there were lanced against yonder target at Ashby. Here, fellow,” added, to one of his attendants, “hast thou sent out to be by what force this precious challenge is to be supported?”

“There are at least two hundred men assembled in the woods,” answered the squire who was in attendance.

“Here is a proper matter!” said Front-de-Bœuf; “this mes of lending you the use of my castle, that cannot manage your undertaking quietly, but you must bring this nest of hornets about my ears!”

“Of hornets!” said De Bracy; “of stingless drones ther; a band of lazy knaves, who take to the wood and destroy the venison rather than labour for their maintenance.”

“Stingless!” replied Front-de-Bœuf; “fork-headed shafts of a cloth-yard in length, and these shot within the breadth of a French crown, are sting enough.”

“For shame, Sir Knight!” said the Templar. “Let us summon our people and sally forth upon them. One knight, one man-at-arms, were enough for twenty such peasants.”

“Enough, and too much,” said De Bracy; “I should only ashamed to couch lance against them.”

“True,” answered Front-de-Bœuf; “were they blackarks or Moors, Sir Templar, or the craven peasants of France, most valiant De Bracy; but these are English yeomen, over whom we shall have no advantage, save what we

---

1 Crown. A French coin, so called because stamped with the device of a Crown. Compare the English sovereign and the French louis d’or.
may derive from our arms and horses, which will avail us little in the glades of the forest. Sally, saidst thou? We have scarce men enough to defend the castle. The best of mine are at York; so is all your band, De Bracy; and we have scarcely twenty, besides the handful that were engaged in this mad business."

"Thou dost not fear," said the Templar, "that they can assemble in force sufficient to attempt the castle?"

"Not so, Sir Brian," answered Front-de-Bœuf. "These outlaws have indeed a daring captain; but without machines, scaling ladders, and experienced leaders, my castle may defy them."

"Send to thy neighbours," said the Templar; "let them assemble their people and come to the rescue of three knights, besieged by a jester and a swineherd in the baronial castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf!"

"You jest, Sir Knight," answered the baron; "but to whom should I send? Malvoisin is by this time at York with his retainers, and so are my other allies; and so should I have been, but for this infernal enterprise."

"Then send to York and recall our people," said De Bracy. "If they abide the shaking of my standard, or the sight of my Free Companions, I will give them credit for the boldest outlaws ever bent bow in greenwood."

"And who shall bear such a message?" said Front-de-Bœuf; "they will beset every path, and rip the errand out of his bosom. I have it," he added, after pausing for a moment. "Sir Templar, thou canst write as well as read, and if we can but find the writing materials of my chaplain, who died a twelvemonth since in the midst of his Christmas carousals——"

"So please ye," said the squire, who was still in attendance, "I think old Urfried has them somewhere in keeping, for love of the confessor. He was the last man, I have heard her tell, who ever said aught to her which man ought in courtesy to address to maid or matron."
“Go, search them out, Engelred,” said Front-de-Bœuf; and then, Sir Templar, thou shalt return an answer to this old challenge.”

“I would rather do it at the sword’s point than at that of the pen,” said Bois-Guilbert; “but be it as you will.”

He sat down accordingly, and indicted, in the French language, an epistle of the following tenor:

“Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, with his noble and mighty allies and confederates, receive no defiances at the hands of slaves, bondsmen, or fugitives. If the person calling himself the Black Knight have indeed a claim to the honour of chivalry, he ought to know that he stands degraded by his present association, and has no right to ask reckoning at the hands of good men of noble blood. Touching the prisoners we have made, we do in Christian charity require you to send a man of religion to receive their concession and reconcile them with God; since it is our fixed intention to execute them this morning before noon, so that their heads, being placed on the battlements, shall show to all men how lightly we esteem those who have bestirred themselves in their rescue. Wherefore, as above, we require you to send a priest to reconcile them to God, in doing which you shall render them the last earthly service.”

This letter, being folded, was delivered to the squire, and by him to the messenger who waited without, as the answer to that which he had brought.

The yeoman, having thus accomplished his mission, returned to the headquarters of the allies, which were for the present established under a venerable oak-tree, about three arrow-flights distant from the castle. Here Wamba and flourith, with their allies the Black Knight and Locksley, and the jovial hermit, awaited with impatience an answer to their summons. Around, and at a distance from them, were seen many a bold yeoman, whose silvan dress and weatherbeaten countenances showed the ordinary nature of their occupation. More than two hundred had already assembled, and others were fast coming in. Those whom they obeyed as leaders were only distinguished from the others by a feather in the cap, their dress, arms, and equipments being in all other respects the same.

Besides these bands, a less orderly and a worse-armed force, consisting of the Saxon inhabitants of the neighbouring township, as well as many bondsmen and servants from Cedric's extensive estate, had already arrived, for the purpose of assisting in his rescue. Few of these were armed otherwise than with such rustic weapons as necessity sometimes converts to military purposes. Boar-spears, scythes, flails, and the like, were their chief arms; for the Normans, with the usual policy of conquerors, were jealous of permitting to the vanquished Saxons the possession or the use of swords and spears. These circumstances rendered the assistance of the Saxons far from being so formidable to the besieged as the strength of the men themselves, their superior numbers, and the animation inspired by a just cause, might otherwise well have made them. It was to the leaders of this motley army that the letter of the Templar was now delivered.

Reference was at first made to the chaplain for an exposition of its contents.

"By the crook¹ of St. Dunstan," said that worthy ecclesiastic, "which hath brought more sheep within the sheepfold than the crook of e'er another saint in Paradise, I swear that I cannot expound unto you this jargon, which, whether it be French or Arabic, is beyond my guess."

He then gave the letter to Gurth, who shook his head gruffly, and passed it to Wamba. The Jester looked at each of the four corners of the paper with such a grin of affected intelligence as a monkey is apt to assume upon similar occasions, then cut a caper, and gave the letter to Locksley.

"If the long letters were bows, and the short letters broad arrows, I might know something of the matter," said

¹ Crook. The bishop's official staff, shaped like a shepherd's crook.
brave yeoman; "but as the matter stands, the meaning is safe, for me, as the stag that's at twelve miles' distance."

"I must be clerk, then," said the Black Knight; and taking the letter from Locksley, he first read it over to him; and then explained the meaning in Saxon to his comrade.

"Execute the noble Cedric!" exclaimed Wamba; "by the honor of my country, I shall not do the thing unless I have the words as they are here set down."

"Then, by St. Thomas of Canterbury," replied Gurth, "I will have the castle, should we tear it down with our hands!"

"We have nothing else to tear it with," replied Wamba; "our swords and our spears are scarce fit to make maimmocks\(^1\) of freestone mortar."

"Tis but a contrivance to gain time," said Locksley; "yet I think that I dare not do a deed for which I could exact a fearful penalty."

"I would," said the Black Knight, "there were some one who could obtain admission into the castle, and thus discover the case stands with the besieged. Methinks, they require a confessor to be sent, this holy hermit might take occasion exercise his pious vocation and procure us the information we desire."

"A plague on thee and thy advice!" said the pious hermit. "I tell thee, Sir Slothful Knight, that when I doff my tonsure, my priesthood, my sanctity, my very Latin, put off along with it; and when in my green jerkin I put on my maimmocks, I shall be more than twenty deer than confess one Christian."

"I fear," said the Black Knight—"I fear greatly there is no one here that is qualified to take upon him, for the nonce,\(^2\) this same character of father confessor?"

\(^{1}\) Maimmocks. Fragments.

\(^{2}\) Noscet. Once.
All looked on each other, and were silent.

"I see," said Wamba, after a short pause, "that the fool must be still the fool, and put his neck in the venture which wise men shrink from. You must know, my dear cousins and countrymen, that I wore russet before I wore motley, and was bred to be a friar, until a brain-fever came upon me and left me just wit enough to be a fool. I trust, with the assistance of the good hermit's frock, together with the priesthood, sanctity, and learning which are stitched into the cowl of it, I shall be found qualified to administer both worldly and ghostly comfort to our worthy master Cedric and his companions in adversity."

"Hath he sense enough, thinkst thou?" said the Black Knight, addressing Gurth.

"I know not," said Gurth; "but if he hath not, it will be the first time he hath wanted wit to turn his folly to account."

"On with the frock, then, good fellow," quoth the Knight, "and let thy master send us an account of their situation within the castle. Their numbers must be few, and it is five to one they may be accessible by a sudden and bold attack. Time wears—away with thee."

"And, in the mean time," said Locksley, "we will beset the place so closely that not so much as a fly shall carry news from thence. So that, my good friend," he continued, addressing Wamba, "thou mayst assure these tyrants that whatever violence they exercise on the persons of their prisoners shall be most severely repaid upon their own."

"Pax vobiscum," said Wamba, who was now muffled in his religious disguise.

And so saying, he imitated the solemn and stately deportment of a friar, and departed to execute his mission.

1 Pax Vobiscum. "Peace be with you!"
CHAPTER XXVI

The hottest horse will oft be cool,
The dullest will show fire;
The friar will often play the fool,
The fool will play the friar.

Old Song.

en the Jester, arrayed in the cowl and frock of the and having his knotted cord twisted round his mid-and before the portal of the castle of Front-de-Bœuf, ieder demanded of him his name and errand.

ex vosberum,” answered the Jester, “I am a poor of the Order of St. Francis,1 who come hither to office to certain unhappy prisoners now secured with-castle.”

you art a bold friar;” said the warder, “to come where, saving our own drunken confessor, a cock of her hath not crowed these twenty years.”

et I pray thee, do mine errand to the lord of the answered the pretended friar; “trust me, it will od acceptance with him, and the cock shall crow, whole castle shall hear him.”

amercy,” said the warder; “but if I come to shame my post upon thine errand, I will try whether grey gown be proof against a grey-goose shaft.”

in this threat he left his turret, and carried to the

1 of St. Francis. Wamba does not pretend to be a monk, but a friar of the Franciscan Order named after St. Francis of Assisi, actually founded until 1210. These were the “Grey Friars,” as they ed, from the color of their gowns. There were three other orders of Friars to be distinguished from the monks—(who were established and priorities):—these were the Dominicans or Black Friars, ites or White Friars, and the Augustinians, who had no distinc-hall of the castle his unwonted intelligence, that a holy friar stood before the gate and demanded instant admision. With no small wonder he received his master's commands to admit the holy man immediately; and, having previously manned the entrance to guard against surprise, he obeyed, without further scruple, the commands which he had received. The hare-brained self-conceit which had emboldened Wamba to undertake this dangerous office was scarcely sufficient to support him when he found himself in the presence of a man so dreadful, and so much dreaded, as Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, and he brought out his "Pax vobiscum," to which he, in a good measure, trusted for supporting his character, with more anxiety and hesitation than had hitherto accompanied it. But Front-de-Bœuf was accustomed to see men of all ranks tremble in his presence, so that the timidity of the supposed father did not give him any cause of suspicion. "Who and whence art thou, priest?" said he.

"Pax vobiscum," reiterated the Jester; "I am a poor servant of St. Francis, who, travelling through this wilderness, have fallen among thieves as Scripture hath it—quidam viator incidit in latrones\textsuperscript{1}—which thieves have sent me unto this castle in order to do my ghostly office on two persons condemned by your honourable justice."

"Ay, right," answered Front-de-Bœuf; "and canst thou tell me, holy father, the number of those banditti?"

"Gallant sir," answered the Jester, "nomen illis legio"— their name is legion."

"Tell me in plain terms what numbers there are, or priest, thy cloak and cord will ill protect thee."

"Alas!" said the supposed friar, "cor meum eructavit," that is to say, I was like to burst with fear! but I con-hey may be, what of yeomen, what of commons, at least ve hundred men.”

“What!” said the Templar, who came into the hall that moment, “muster the wasps so thick here? It is time to tifle such a mischievous brood.” Then taking Front-dedeufl aside, “Knowest thou the priest?”

“He is a stranger from a distant convent,” said Front-de-Bœuf; “I know him not.”

“Then trust him not with thy purpose in words,” anwered the Templar. “Let him carry a written order to be Bracy’s company of Free Companions, to repair instanty to their master’s aid. In the mean time, and that the haveling may suspect nothing, permit him to go freely bout his task of preparing these Saxon hogs for the slaughter-house.”

“It shall be so,” said Front-de-Bœuf. And he forthwith ppointed a domestic to conduct Wamba to the apartment here Cedric and Athelstane were confined.

The impatience of Cedric had been rather enhanced han diminished by his confinement. He walked from one end of the hall to the other, with the attitude of one who vances to charge an enemy, or to storm the breach of a celeaguered place, sometimes ejaculating to himself, sometimes addressing Athelstane, who stoutly and stoically waited the issue of the adventure, digesting, in the meantime, with great composure, the liberal meal which he had ade at noon, and not greatly interesting himself about the uration of his captivity, which he concluded would, like all defly evils, find an end in Heaven’s good time.

“Pax vobiscum,” said the Jester, entering the apartment; “the blessing of St. Dunstan, St. Denis, St. Duthoe, nd all other saints whatsoever, be upon ye and about ye.”

“Enter freely,” answered Cedric to the supposed friar;
with what intent art thou come hither?”

“To bid you prepare yourselves for death,” answered the ester,
“It is impossible!” replied Cedric, starting. “Fearless and wicked as they are, they dare not attempt such open and gratuitous cruelty!”

“Alas!” said the Jester, “to restrain them by their sense of humanity is the same as to stop a runaway horse with a bridle of silk thread. Bethink thee, therefore, noble Cedric, and you also, gallant Athelstane, what crimes you have committed in the flesh; for this very day will ye be called to answer at a higher tribunal.”

“Hearest thou this, Athelstane?” said Cedric. “We must rouse up our hearts to this last action, since better it is we should die like men than live like slaves.”

“I am ready,” answered Athelstane, “to stand the worst of their malice, and shall walk to my death with as much composure as ever I did to my dinner.”

“Let us then unto our holy gear, father,” said Cedric.

“Wait yet a moment, good uncle,” said the Jester, in his natural tone; “better look long before you leap into the dark.”

“By my faith,” said Cedric, “I should know that voice!”

“It is that of your trusty slave and jester,” answered Wamba, throwing back his cowl. “Had you taken a fool’s advice formerly, you would not have been here at all. Take a fool’s advice now, and you will not be here long.”

“How mean’st thou, knave?” answered the Saxon.

“Even thus,” replied Wamba; “take thou this frock and cord, which are all the orders I ever had, and march quietly out of the castle, leaving me your cloak and girdle to take the long leap in thy stead.”

“Leave thee in my stead!” said Cedric, astonished at the proposal; “why, they would hang thee, my poor knave.”

“E’en let them do as they are permitted,” said Wamba; “I trust—no disparagement to your birth—that the son of

1 Gear. Business.
2 Orders. Degrees in holy office.
Witless may hang in a chain\(^1\) with as much gravity as the chain hung upon his ancestor the alderman."

"Well, Wamba," answered Cedric, "for one thing will I grant thy request. And that is, if thou wilt make the exchange of garments with Lord Athelstane instead of me."

"No, by St. Dunstan," answered Wamba; "there were little reason in that. Good right there is that the son of Witless should suffer to save the son of Hereward; but little wisdom there were in his dying for the benefit of one whose fathers were strangers to his."

"Villain," said Cedric, "the fathers of Athelstane were monarchs of England!"

"They might be whomsoever they pleased," replied Wamba; "but my neck stands too straight upon my shoulders to have it twisted for their sake. Wherefore, good my master, either take my proffer yourself or suffer me to leave this dungeon as free as I entered."

"Let the old tree wither," continued Cedric, "so the stately hope of the forest be preserved. Save the noble Athelstane, my trusty Wamba! it is the duty of each who has Saxon blood in his veins. Thou and I will abide together the utmost rage of our injurious oppressors, while he, free and safe, shall arouse the awakened spirits of our countrymen to avenge us."

"Not so, father Cedric," said Athelstane, grasping his hand, for, when roused to think or act, his deeds and sentiments were not unbecoming his high race—"not so," he continued; "I would rather remain in this hall a week without food save the prisoner's stinted loaf, or drink save the prisoner's measure of water, than embrace the opportunity to escape which the slave's untaught kindness has surveyed for his master."

"You are called wise men, sirs," said the Jester, "and a crazed fool; but, uncle Cedric and cousin Athelstane, he fool shall decide this controversy for ye, and save ye..."

---

\(^1\) Chain. Badge of the alderman's official dignity.
the trouble of straining courtesies any farther. I am like John-a-Duck’s mare, that will let no man mount her but John-a-Duck. I came to save my master, and if he will not consent, basta! I can but go away home again. Kind service cannot be chucked from hand to hand like a shuttlecock or stool-ball. I’ll hang for no man but my own born master.”

“Go, then, noble Cedric,” said Athelstane, “neglect not this opportunity. Your presence without may encourage friends to our rescue; your remaining here would ruin us all.”

“And is there any prospect, then, of rescue from without?” said Cedric, looking to the Jester.

“Prospect, indeed!” echoed Wamba; “let me tell you, when you fill my cloak, you are wrapped in a general’s cassock. Five hundred men are there without, and I was this morning one of their chief leaders. My fool’s cap was a casque, and my bauble a truncheon. Well, we shall see what good they will make by exchanging a fool for a wise man. Truly, I fear they will lose in valour what they may gain in discretion. And so farewell, master, and be kind to poor Gurth and his dog Fangs; and let my coxcomb hang in the hall at Rotherwood, in memory that I flung away my life for my master, like a faithful—fool.” The last word came out with a sort of double expression, betwixt jest and earnest.

The tears stood in Cedric’s eyes. “Thy memory shall be preserved,” he said, “while fidelity and affection have honour upon earth! But that I trust I shall find the means of saving Rowena, and thee, Athelstane, and thee also, my poor Wamba, thou shouldst not overbear me in this matter.”

The exchange of dress was now accomplished, when a sudden doubt struck Cedric.

*basta. An Italian word; “enough.”
“I know no language,” he said, “but my own, and a few words of their mincing Norman. How shall I bear myself to a reverend brother?”

“The spell lies in two words,” replied Wamba. “Pax vobiscum will answer all queries. If you go or come, eat or drink, bless or ban, Pax vobiscum carries you through it all. It is as useful to a friar as a broomstick to a witch, or a mand to a conjurer. Speak it but thus, in a deep grave tone Pax vobiscum—it is irresistible. Watch and ward, knight, sir, foot and horse, it acts as a charm upon them.

I think, if they bring me out to be hanged to-morrow, is much to be doubted they may, I will try its weight on the finisher of the sentence.”

“If such prove the case,” said his master, “my religious vows are soon taken—Pax vobiscum. I trust I shall remember the password. Noble Athelstane, farewell; and ewell, my poor boy, whose heart might make amends in a weaker head; I will save you, or return and die with you. The royal blood of our Saxon kings shall not be spilt while mine beats in my veins; nor shall one hair fall from the head of the kind knave who risked himself for his master, if Cedric’s peril can prevent it. Farewell.”

“Farewell, noble Cedric,” said Athelstane; “remember, the true part of a friar to accept refreshment, if you are not in need any.”

“Farewell, uncle,” added Wamba; “and remember Pax vobiscum.”

Thus exhorted, Cedric sallied forth upon his expedition; and it was not long ere he had occasion to try the force of that spell which his Jester had recommended as omnipotent. In a low-arched and dusky passage, by which he ventured to work his way to the hall of the castle, he was interrupted by a female form.

“Pax vobiscum!” said the pseudo friar, and was endeavouring to hurry past, when a soft voice replied, “Et vobis: quæso, domine reverendissime, pro misericordia vestra."

"I am somewhat deaf," replied Cedric, in good Sax and at the same time muttered to himself, "A curse on the fool and his Pax vobiscum! I have lost my javelin at the first cast."

It was, however, no unusual thing for a priest of the days to be deaf of his Latin ear, and this the person
now addressed Cedric knew full well.

"I pray you of dear love, reverend father," she replied in his own language, "that you will deign to visit with you ghostly comfort a wounded prisoner of this castle, and has such compassion upon him and us as thy holy office teach.
Never shall good deed so highly advantage thy convent."

"Daughter," answered Cedric, much embarrassed," time in this castle will not permit me to exercise the duty of mine office. I must presently forth: there is life and death upon my speed."

"Yet, father, let me entreat you by the vow you have taken on you," replied the suppliant, "not to leave the pressed and endangered without counsel or succour."

"May the fiend fly away with me, and leave me in Hell with the souls of Odin and of Thor!" answered Cedric impatiently, and would probably have proceeded in same tone of total departure from his spiritual character when the colloquy was interrupted by the harsh voice of Urfrid, the old crone of the turret.

"How, minion," said she to the female speaker, "is the manner in which you requite the kindness which promitted thee to leave thy prison-cell yonder? Puttest thou the reverend man to use ungracious language to free him self from the importunities of a Jewess?"

1 Et Vobis, etc. "And with you. I pray, most reverend father, for

2 DE. Hell.

3 Or. The Thunderer, son of Odin.
A Jewess!” said Cedric, availing himself of the interruption. “Let me pass, sir! stop me not at your peril. I am fresh from my office, and would avoid pollution.”

Come this way, father,” said the old hag, “thou art a danger in this castle, and canst not leave it without a fee. Come thither, for I would speak with thee. And as daughter of an accursed race, go to the sick man’s chamber, and tend him until my return; and woe betide you if you again quit it without my permission!”

Rebecca retreated. Her importunities had prevailed. Urfrid and her to quit the turret, and Urfrid employed her services where she herself would most have paid them, by the bedside of the wounded man. With an understanding awake to their dangerous position, and prompt to avail herself of each means of which occurred, Rebecca had hoped something from the presence of a man of religion, who, she learned from her father, had penetrated into this godless castle. She met the return of the supposed ecclesiastic, with the ease of addressing him, and interesting him in favour of the prisoners; with what imperfect success the reader seen just acquainted.
CHAPTER XXVII

Fond wretch! and what canst thou relate,
   But deeds of sorrow, shame, and sin?
Thy deeds are proved—thou know'st thy fate;
   But come, thy tale—begin—begin.

But I have griefs of other kind,
   Troubles and sorrows more severe;
Give me to ease my tortured mind,
   Lend to my woes a patient ear;
And let me, if I may not find
   A friend to help—find one to hear.

CRABBE'S Hall of Justice.

When Urfried had with clamours and menaces driven Rebecca back to the apartment from which she had sallied, she proceeded to conduct the unwilling Cedric into a small apartment, the door of which she heedfully secured. Then fetching from a cupboard a stoup of wine and two flagons, she placed them on the table, and said in a tone rather asserting a fact than asking a question, “Thou art Saxon, father. Deny it not,” she continued, observing that Cedric hastened not to reply; “the sounds of my native language are sweet to mine ears, though seldom heard save from the tongues of the wretched and degraded serfs on whom the proud Normans impose the meanest drudgery of this dwelling. Thou art a Saxon, father—a Saxon, and, save as thou art a servant of God, a freeman. Thine accents are sweet in mine ear.”

“Do not Saxon priests visit this castle, then?” replied Cedric; “it were, methinks, their duty to comfort the outcast and oppressed children of the soil.”

“They come not; or if they come, they better love to
at the boards of their conquerors," answered Urfried, an to hear the groans of their countrymen; so, at least, for speaks of them, of myself I can say little. This for ten years, has opened to no priest save the de-chic Norman chaplain who partook the nightly revels Front-de-Bœuf, and he has been long gone to render an ont of his stewardship. But thou art a Saxon—a Saxon est, and I have one question to ask of thee."

"I am Saxon," answered Cedric, "but unworthy, sure-of the name of priest. Let me begone on my way. I will return, or send one of our fathers more worthy hear your confession."

"Stay yet a while," said Urfried; "the accents of the ch thou hearest now will soon be choked with the earth, and I would not descend to it like the beast I ve lived. But wine must give me strength to tell the tors of my tale." She poured out a cup, and drank it h a frightful avidity, which seemed desirous of draining last drop in the goblet. "It stupefies," she said, looking ards as she finished her draught, "but it cannot cheer.
ake it, father, if you would hear my tale without sink-down upon the pavement." Cedric would have avoided gging her in this ominous conviviality, but the sign ch she made to him expressed impatience and despair.
plied with her request, and answered her challenge arge wine-cup; she then proceeded with her story, as if ased by his complaisance.

"I was not born," she said, "father, the wretch that thou seest me. I was free, was happy, was honoured, loved, was beloved. I am now a slave, miserable and degraded, port of my masters' passions while I had yet beauty, object of their contempt, scorn, and hatred, since it has ed away. Dost thou wonder, father, that I should hate kind, and, above all, the race that has wrought this age in me? Can the wrinkled decrepit hag before thee, re wrath must vent itself in impotent curses, forget she was once the daughter of the noble thane of Torquilstone, before whose frown a thousand vassals trembled?"

"Thou the daughter of Torquil Wolfganger!" said Cedric, receding as he spoke; "thou—thou—the daughter of that noble Saxon, my father's friend and companion in arms!"

"Thy father's friend!" echoed Urfried; "then Cedric called the Saxon stands before me, for the noble Hereward of Rotherwood had but one son, whose name is well known among his countrymen. But if thou art Cedric of Rotherwood, why this religious dress? hast thou too despaired of saving thy country, and sought refuge from oppression in the shade of the convent?"

"It matters not who I am," said Cedric; "proceed, unhappy woman, with thy tale of horror and guilt! Guilt there must be; there is guilt even in thy living to tell it."

"There is—there is," answered the wretched woman,
"deep, black, damning guilt—guilt that lies like a load at my breast—guilt that all the penitential fires of hereafter cannot cleanse. Yes, in these halls, stained with the noble and pure blood of my father and my brethren—in these very halls, to have lived the paramour of their murderer, the slave at once and the partaker of his pleasures, was to render every breath which I drew of vital air a crime and a curse."

"Wretched woman!" exclaimed Cedric. "And while the friends of thy father—while each true Saxon heart, as it breathed a requiem for his soul, and those of his valiant sons, forgot not in their prayers the murdered Ulrica—while all mourned and honoured the dead, thou hast lived to merit our hate and execration—lived to unite thyself with the vile tyrant who murdered thy nearest and dearest, who shed the blood of infancy rather than a male of the noble house of Torquil Wolfganger should survive—with him hast thou lived to unite thyself, and in the hands of lawless love!"
n lawless bands, indeed, but not in those of love!”
red the hag; “love will sooner visit the regions of do doom than those unhallowed vaults. No; with that ist I cannot reproach myself: hatred to Front-de-Bœuf his race governed my soul most deeply, even in the
of his guilty endearments.”
You hated him, and yet you lived,” replied Cedric;
ch! was there no poniard—no knife—no bodkin! Well for thee, since thou didst prize such an existence, the secrets of a Norman castle are like those of the
. For had I but dreamed of the daughter of Torqu
; in foul communion with the murderer of her father, word of a true Saxon had found thee out even in the
of thy paramour!”
Wouldst thou indeed have done this justice to the name Torqu?” said Ulrica, for we may now lay aside her ed name of Urfried; “thou art then the true Saxon speaks thee! for even within these accursed walls,
, as thou well sayest, guilt shrouds itself in inscrutable
ery—even there has the name of Cedric been sounded;
, wretched and degraded, have rejoiced to think that yet breathed an avenger of our unhappy nation. I have had my hours of vengeance. I have fomented arrels of our foes, and heated drunken revelry into rous broil. I have seen their blood flow—I have their dying groans! Look on me, Cedric; are there ill left on this foul and faded face some traces of the es of Torqu?”
Ask me not of them, Ulrica,” replied Cedric, in a tone ef mixed with abhorrence; “these traces form such a hance as arises from the grave of the dead when a has animated the lifeless corpse.”
Be it so,” answered Ulrica; “yet wore these fiendish es the mask of a spirit of light when they were able to stance the elder Front-de-Bœuf and his son Reg-
The darkness of hell should hide what followed;
but revenge must lift the veil, and darkly intimate what would raise the dead to speak aloud. Long had the smoldering fire of discord glowed between the tyrant father and his savage son; long had I nursed, in secret, the unna-tured hatred; it blazed forth in an hour of drunken wassail, at his own board fell my oppressor by the hand of his son: such are the secrets these vaults conceal! Rend as-der, ye accursed arches," she added, looking up towards roof, "and bury in your fall all who are conscious of hideous mystery!"

"And thou, creature of guilt and misery," said Cedric,
"what became thy lot on the death of thy ravisher?"

"Guess it, but ask it not. Here—here I dwelt, till a premature age, has stamped its ghastly features on my contenance—scorned and insulted where I was once obey-and compelled to bound the revenge which had once so ample scope to the efforts of petty malice of a disconmenial, or the vain or unheeded curses of an impotent condemned to hear from my lonely turret the sounds of revelry in which I once partook, or the shrieks and groan-of new victims of oppression."

"Ulrica," said Cedric, "with a heart which still, I regrets the lost reward of thy crimes, as much as the do-by which thou didst acquire that meed, how didst thou dare to address thee to one who wears this robe? O sider, unhappy woman, what could the sainted Edw himself do for thee, were he here in bodily presence? The royal Confessor was endowed by Heaven with power cleanse the ulcers of the body; but only God Himself cure the leprosy of the soul."

"Yet turn not from me, stern prophet of wrath," exclaimed, "but tell me, if thou canst, in what shall

* * *THE SAINTED EDWARD. Edward, surnamed the Confessor, was the Anglo-Saxon king of the old royal line. He was a weak and saintly arch, but the memory of his virtues made his reign remarkably popular.
traditions of the people, and because of his monastic character and un fervor he was canonized in 1161, by Pope Alexander III.
IVANHOE

Why do deeds, long since done, rise before me in and irresistible horrors? What fate is prepared beyond her to whom God has assigned on earth a lot unspeakable wretchedness? Better had I turn to Hertha, and Zernebock, to Mista, and to Skogula, ods of our yet unbaptised ancestors, than endure the ful anticipations which have of late haunted my wak-d my sleeping hours!"

am no priest,” said Cedric, turning with disgust this miserable picture of guilt, wretchedness, and r—“I am no priest, though I wear a priest’s gar-priest or layman,” answered Ulrica, “thou art the first seen for twenty years by whom God was feared or regarded; and dost thou bid me despair?”

bid thee repent,” said Cedric. “Seek to prayer and ce, and mayest thou find acceptance! But I cannot, not, longer abide with thee.”

stay yet a moment!” said Ulrica; “leave me not now, my father’s friend, lest the demon who has governed should tempt me to avenge myself of thy hard-d scorn. Thinkest thou, if Front-de-Bœuf found the Saxon in his castle, in such a disguise, that thy ould be a long one? Already his eye has been upon ke a falcon on his prey.”

and be it so,” said Cedric; “and let him tear me with and talons, ere my tongue say one word which my loth not warrant. I will die a Saxon—true in word, deed. I bid thee avaunt! touch me not, stay me not!
ight of Front-de-Bœuf himself is less odious to me
hou, degraded and degenerate as thou art.”
ne it so,” said Ulrica, no longer interrupting him; “go

Woden was the Saxon form of Odin; Hertha was the earth-t of the Teutons; Mista and Skogula were Valkyries, daughters of Odin, ected the spirits of warriors slain in battle to Valhalla, the abode of thy way, and forget, in the insolence of thy superiority, the wretch before thee is the daughter of thy father’s foe. Go thy way; if I am separated from mankind by my sufferings—separated from those whose aid I might most expect—not less will I be separated from them in my vengeance! No man shall aid me, but the ears of all men tingle to hear of the deed which I shall dare to do! well! thy scorn has burst the last tie which seemed to unite me to my kind—a thought that my woes might compass the compassion of my people.”

“Ulrica,” said Cedric, softened by this appeal, thou born up and endured to live through so much and so much misery, and wilt thou now yield to despair when thine eyes are opened to thy crimes, and whose repentance were thy fitter occupation?”

“Cedric,” answered Ulrica, “thou little knowest human heart. To act as I have acted, to think as I thought, requires the madlyning love of pleasure, mingled with the keen appetite of revenge, the proud conscience of power—draughts too intoxicating for the human to bear, and yet retain the power to prevent. Their has long passed away. Age has no pleasures, wrinkles no influence, revenge itself dies away in impotent despair! Then comes remorse, with all its vipers, mixed with regrets for the past and despair for the future! Then, all other strong impulses have ceased, we become like fiends in hell, who may feel remorse, but never repent. But thy words have awakened a new soul within me. hast thou said, all is possible for those who dare to. Thou hast shown me the means of revenge, and be as I will embrace them. It has hitherto shared this bosom with other and with rival passions; henceforth it shall possess me wholly, and thou thyself shalt say whatever was the life of Ulrica, her death well became daughter of the noble Torquil. There is a force which beleaguering this accursed castle; hasten to lead attack, and when thou shalt see a red flag wave from surret on the eastern angle of the donjon, press the mans hard: they will then have enough to do within, you may win the wall in spite both of bow and man-
.1 Begone, I pray thee; follow thine own fate, and me to mine.”
redric would have inquired farther into the purpose
she thus darkly announced, but the stern voice of de-Bœuf was heard exclaiming, “Where tarries this king priest? By the scallop-shell of Compostella,2 I will a martyr of him, if he loiters here to hatch treason ng my domestics!”
What a true prophet,” said Ulrica, “is an evil con-ce! But heed him not; out and to thy people. Cry Saxon onslaught; and let them sing their war-song lo,3 if they will, vengeance shall bear a burden to it.”
as she thus spoke, she vanished through a private door, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf entered the apartment. Cedewith some difficulty, compelled himself to make obet the haughty Baron, who returned his courtesy with ht inclination of the head.
thy penitents, father, have made a long shrift: it is the r for them, since it is the last they shall ever make.
ou prepared them for death?”
I found them,” said Cedric, in such French as he could and, “expecting the worst, from the moment they into whose power they had fallen.”
How now, Sir Friar,” replied Front-de-Bœuf, “thy b, methinks, smacks of a Saxon tongue?”
I was bred in the convent of St. Withold of Burton,” ered Cedric.

ALLOP-SEaL. A war engine for hurling stones.

AS THE PALM-BRANCH was the token of a pilgrimage to Land, so too was the scallop-shell a pilgrim’s badge, particularly the ng returned from the shrine of St. James at Compostella, in Spain.
A Norse viking, first Duke of Normandy. The “war-song” re was the battle-cry of the Normans at Hastings, Ha Rou! Ha Rou!
“Ay?” said the Baron; “it had been better for thee if you had been a Norman, and better for my purpose too; but where your need has no choice of messengers. That St. Withold’s Burton is a howlet’s nest worth the harrying.1 The day we soon come that the flock shall protect the Saxon as little as the mail-coat.”

“God’s will be done,” said Cedric, in a voice tremulous with passion, which Front-de-Bœuf imputed to fear.

“I see,” said he, “thou dreamest already that our men-at-arms are in thy refectory and thy ale-vaults. But do one cast of thy holy office, and, come what list of other thou shalt sleep as safe in thy cell as a snail within his shell of proof.”

“Speak your commands,” said Cedric, with suppressed emotion.

“Follow me through this passage, then, that I may miss thee by the postern.”

And as he strode on his way before the supposed friar Front-de-Bœuf thus schooled him in the part which he desired he should act.

“Thou seest, Sir Friar, ye herd of Saxon swine, have dared to environ this castle of Torquilstone.
Thou hast a mind of the weakness of a fortalice,2 or aught else that can detain them before it twenty-four hours. Meantime bear thou this scroll.

soft—canst read, Sir Priest?”

“Not a jot I,” answered Cedric, “save on my brief and then I know the characters, because I have the service by heart, praised be Our Lady and St. Withold!”

“The fitter messenger for my purpose. Carry thou scroll to the castle of Philip de Malvoisin; say it cometh from me, and is written by the Templar Brian de F Guilbert, and that I pray him to send it to York with the speed man and horse can make. Meanwhile, tell

1 Harrying. From an Anglo-Saxon verb, meaning to strip, to pillage
2 Fortalice. A small fort, an outwork nothing, he shall find us whole and sound behind "Shame on it, that we should be compelled us by a pack of runagates, who are wont to fly the flash of our pennons and the tramp of our say to thee, priest, contrive some cast of thine to the knaves where they are, until our friends their lances. My vengeance is awake, and she is at slumbers not till she has been gorged."
y patron saint," said Cedric, with deeper energy ne his character, "and by every saint who has died in England, your commands shall be obeyed! n shall stir from before these walls, if I have art to detain them there."
said Front-de-Bœuf, "thou changest thy tone, and speakest brief and bold, as if thy heart were ghter of the Saxon herd; and yet thou art thyself to the swine?"
was no ready practiser of the art of dissimulation, at this moment have been much the better of a Wamba's more fertile brain. But necessity, ac- the ancient proverb, sharpens invention, and he something under his cowl concerning the men in ning excommunicated outlaws both to church and h.
rdieux," answered Front-de-Bœuf, "thou hast very truth: I forgot that the knaves can strip as well as if they had been born south of yonder el. Was it not he of St. Ives whom they tied to e, and compelled to sing a mass while they were mails and his wallets? No, by Our Lady, that rayed by Gualtier of Middleton, one of our com- arms. But they were Saxons who robbed the St. Bees of cup, candlestick, and chalice, were were godless men," answered Cedric, and they drank out all the good wine and ale that lay in store for many a secret carousal, when ye pretend ye are but busied with vigils and primes! Priest, thou art bound to revenge such sacrilege.”

“I am indeed bound to vengeance,” murmured Cedric;

“St. Withold knows my heart.”

Front-de-Bœuf, in the mean while, led the way to a postern, where, passing the moat on a single plank, they reached a small barbican, or exterior defence, which communicated with the open field by a well-fortified sallyport.¹

“Begone, then; and if thou wilt do mine errand, and if thou return hither when it is done, thou shalt see Sax flesh cheap as ever was hog’s in the shambles of Sheffield. And, hark thee, thou seemest to be a jolly confessor; come hither after the onslaught, and thou shalt have as much Malvoisie² as would drench thy whole convent.”

“Assuredly we shall meet again,” answered Cedric.

“Something in hand the whilst,” continued the Norman; and, as they parted at the postern door, he thrust into Cedric’s reluctant hand a gold byzant, adding, “Remember, I will flay off both cowl and skin if thou failest in thy purpose.”

“And full leave will I give thee to do both,” answered Cedric, leaving the postern, and striding forth over the field with a joyful step, “if, when we meet next, I deserve not better at thine hand.” Turning then back towards the castle, he threw the piece of gold towards the donor, exclaiming at the same time, “False Norman, thy money perish with thee!”

Front-de-Bœuf heard the words imperfectly, but the action was suspicious. “Archers,” he called to the warders on the outward battlements, “send me an arrow through your monk’s frock! Yet stay,” he said, as his retainers were their bows, "it avails not; we must thus far trust we have no better shift. I think he dares not bet the worst I can but treat with these Saxon dogs safe in kennel. Ho! Giles jailor, let them of Rotherwood before me, and the other churl,———him I mean of Coningsburgh—Aethelstane what call they him? Their very names are an grace to a Norman knight's mouth, and have, as it sour of bacon. Give me a stoup of wine, as jolly can said, that I may wash away the relish; place mourny, and thither lead the prisoners."

¹ SALLY-PORT. The postern gate of a fortification, whence issues were made by the besieged.

² MALVOISIE. Malmsey; a strong sweet wine.

Commands were obeyed; and, upon entering that court, hung with many spoils won by his own that of his father, he found a flagon of wine on the oaken table, and the two Saxon captives under of four of his dependants. Front-de-Bœuf tookught of wine, and then addressed his prisoners; dinner in which Wamba drew the cap over his face, of dress, the gloomy and broken light, and the perfect acquaintance with the features of Cedric, ed his Norman neighbours, and seldom stirred beewn domains, prevented him from discovering that important of his captives had made his escape.

"Inns of England," said Front-de-Bœuf, "how relish entertainment at Torquilstone? Are ye yet aware surqued and outrecuidance¹ merit, for scoffing atainment of a prince of the house of Anjou?forgotten how ye requited the unmerited hospitalloyal John? By God and St. Denis, an ye pay not ransom, I will hang ye up by the feet from the of these windows, till the kites and hooded crowskeletons of you! Speak out, ye Saxon dogs—efor your worthless lives? How say you, ye old?"

¹ Outrecuidance: Insolence and presumption. (Scott)
“Not a doit¹ I,” answered poor Wamba; “and for hanging up by the feet, my brain has been topsy-turvy, they say, ever since the biggin² was bound first round my head; so turning me upside down may peradventure restore it again.”

“St. Genevieve!” said Front-de-Bœuf, “what have we got here?”

And with the back of his hand he struck Cedric’s cap from the head of the Jester, and throwing open his collar, discovered the fatal badge of servitude, the silver collar round his neck.

“Giles—Clement—dogs and varlets!” exclaimed the furious Norman, “what have you brought me here?”

“I think I can tell you,” said de Bracy, who just entered the apartment. “This is Cedric’s clown, who fought so manful a skirmish with Isaac of York about a question of precedence.”

“I shall settle it for them both,” replied Front-de-Bœuf; “they shall hang on the same gallows, unless his master and this boar of Coningsburgh will pay well for their lives. Their wealth is the least they can surrender; they must also carry off with them the swarms that are besetting the castle, subscribe a surrender of their pretended immunities, and live under us as serfs and vassals; too happy if, in the new world that is about to begin, we leave them the breath of their nostrils. Go,” said he to two of his attendants, “fetch me the right Cedric hither, and I pardon your error for once; the rather that you but mistook a fool for a Saxon franklin.”

“Ay, but,” said Wamba, “your chivalrous excellency will find there are more fools than franklins among us.”

“What means the knave?” said Front-de-Bœuf, looking towards his followers, who, lingering and loth, faltered forth their belief that, if this were not Cedric who was there in presence, they knew not what was become of him.

¹ Dort. A Dutch coin worth a quarter of a cent; also a Scotch coin worth nearly as much.
² Biggin. A child’s cap.
hants of Heaven!” exclaimed De Bracy, “he must have in the monk’s garments!”

Friends of hell!” echoed Front-de-Bœuf, “it was then of Rotherwood whom I ushered to the postern, and sed with my own hands! And thou,” he said to a, “whose folly could overreach the wisdom of idiots are gross than thyself—I will give thee holy orders—shave thy crown for thee! Here, let them tear the rom his head, and then pitch him headlong from the ents. Thy trade is to jest, canst thou jest now?”

ou deal with me better than your word, noble
,” whimpered forth poor Wamba, whose habits of ery were not to be overcome even by the immediate ct of death; “if you give me the red cap you propose, a simple monk you will make a cardinal.”

e poor wretch,” said De Bracy, “is resolved to die in ation. Front-de-Bœuf, you shall not slay him. Give me to make sport for my Free Companions. How hou, knave? Wilt thou take heart of grace, and go ars with me?”

ly, with my master’s leave,” said Wamba; “for, look ust not slip collar (and he touched that which he without his permission.”

h, a Norman saw will soon cut a Saxon collar,” said
acy.

ly, noble sir,” said Wamba, “and thence goes the Norman saw an English oak,

On English neck a Norman yoke
Norman spoon in English dish,
And England ruled as Normans wish;
Blythe the world to England never will be more,
Till England’s rid of all the four,” thou dost well, De Bracy,” said Front-de-Bœuf, “to there listening to a fool’s jargon, when destruction is for us! Seest thou not we are overreached, and that posed mode of communicating with our friends wit out has been disconcerted by this same motley gentleman thou art so fond to brother? What views have we to expect but instant storm?”

“To the battlements then,” said De Bracy; “when didst thou ever see me the graver for the thoughts of battle? Call the Templar yonder, and let him fight but half so well for his life as he has done for his order. Make thou to the walls thyself with thy huge body. Let me do my poor endeavour in my own way, and I tell thee the Saxon outlaws may as well attempt to scale the clouds as the castle of Turquilstone; or, if you will treat with the banditti, why not employ the mediation of this worthy franklin, who seems in such deep contemplation of the wine-flagon? Here, Saxon,” he continued, addressing Athelstane, and handing the cup to him, “rinse thy throat with that noble liquor, and rouse up thy soul to say what thou wilt do for thy liberty.”

“What a man of mould may,” answered Athelstane, “providing it be what a man of manhood ought. Dismiss me free, with my companions, and I will pay a ransom of a thousand marks.”

“And wilt moreover assure us the retreat of that scum of mankind who are swarming around the castle, contrary to God’s peace and the king’s?” said Front-de-Bœuf.

“In so far as I can,” answered Athelstane, “I will withdraw them; and I fear not but that my father Cedric will do his best to assist me.”

“We are agreed then,” said Front-de-Bœuf; “thou and they are to be set at freedom, and peace is to be on both sides, for payment of a thousand marks. It is a trifling ransom, Saxon, and thou wilt owe gratitude to the moderation which accepts of it in exchange of your persons. But mark, this extends not to the Jew Isaac.”

“Nor to the Jew Isaac’s daughter,” said the Templar, who had now joined them.

“Neither,” said Front-de-Bœuf, “belong to this Saxon’s company.”
“I were unworthy to be called Christian, if they did,” replied Athelstane; “deal with the unbelievers as ye list.”

“Neither does the ransom include the Lady Rowena,” said De Bracy. “It shall never be said I was scared out of a fair prize without striking a blow for it.”

“Neither,” said Front-de-Bœuf, “does our treaty refer to this wretched Jester, whom I retain, that I may make him an example to every knave who turns jest into earnest.”

“The Lady Rowena,” answered Athelstane, with the most steady countenance, “is my affianced bride. I will be drawn by wild horses before I consent to part with her. The slave Wamba has this day saved the life of my father Cedric. I will lose mine ere a hair of his head be injured.”

“Thy affianced bride! The Lady Rowena the affianced ride of a vassal like thee!” said De Bracy. “Saxon, thou rearest that the days of thy seven kingdoms are returned again. I tell thee, the princes of the house of Anjou confer on their wards on men of such lineage as thine.”

“My lineage, proud Norman,” replied Athelstane, “is drawn from a source more pure and ancient than that of a eggarly Frenchman, whose living is won by selling the lood of the thieves whom he assembles under his paltry standard. Kings were my ancestors, strong in war, and rise in council, who every day feasted in their hall more hundreds than thou canst number individual followers; whose names have been sung by minstrels, and their laws recorded by Witenagemotes:1 whose bones were interred mid the prayers of saints, and over whose tombs minsters have been builded.”

“Thou hast it, De Bracy,” said Front-de-Bœuf, well pleased with the rebuff which his companion had received; the Saxon hath hit thee fairly.”

“As fairly as a captive can strike,” said De Bracy, with apparent carelessness; “for he whose hands are tied should

1 WITENAGEMOTES. The word means “assembly of the wise men,” and was the title of the supreme council of the nation in Anglo-Saxon times. have his tongue at freedom. But thy glibness of reply, comrade," rejoined he, speaking to Athelstane, "will not win the freedom of the Lady Rowena."

To this Athelstane, who had already made a longer speech than was his custom to do on any topic, however interesting, returned no answer. The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of a menial, who announced that a monk demanded admittance at the postern gate.

"In the name of St. Bennet,¹ the prince of these bull-beggars,"² said Front-de-Bœuf, "have we a real monk this time, or another impostor? Search him, slaves; for any ye suffer a second impostor to be palmed upon you, I will have your eyes torn out, and hot coals put into the sockets."

"Let me endure the extremity of your anger, my lord," said Giles, "if this be not a real shaveling. Your squire Jocelyn knows him well, and will vouch him to be Brother Ambrose, a monk in attendance upon the Prior of Jorvaulx."

"Admit him," said Front-de-Bœuf; "most likely he brings us news from his jovial master. Surely the devil keeps holiday, and the priests are relieved from duty, that they are strolling thus wildly through the country. Remove these prisoners; and, Saxon, think on what thou hast heard."

"I claim," said Athelstane, "an honourable imprisonment, with due care of my board and of my couch, as becomes my rank, and as is due to one who is in treaty for ransom. Moreover, I hold him that deems himself the best of you bound to answer to me with his body for this aggression on my freedom. This defiance hath already been sent to thee by thy sewer; thou underliest it, and art bound to answer me. There lies my glove."

¹ St. BENNET. St. Benedict, who founded the Order of the Benedictines in 529.

² BULL-BEGGARS. Hobgoblins, bugbears. The word occurs in the following phrase from the Tatler, No. 212: "This was certainly an ass in a bag-ful; a harmless bull-beggar, who delights to frighten innocent people."
I answer not the challenge of my prisoner," said Front-œuf, "nor shalt thou, Maurice de Bracy. Giles," he inued, "hang the franklin’s glove upon the tine of your branched antlers; there shall it remain until he is a free. Should he then presume to demand it, or to affirm I was unlawfully made my prisoner, by the belt of St. stopher, he will speak to one who hath never refused to a foe on foot or on horseback, alone or with his vassals back!"

The Saxon prisoners were accordingly removed, just as I introduced the monk Ambrose, who appeared to be in perturbation.

This is the real Deus vobiscum," said Wamba, as he ed the reverend brother; "the others were but counter-

"Holy Mother!" said the monk; as he addressed the as-pled knights, "I am at last safe and in Christian keep-

Safe thou art," replied De Bracy, "and for Christianity, is the stout Baron Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, whose abomination is a Jew; and the good Knight Templar, de Bois-Guilbert, whose trade is to slay Saracens. If we are not good marks of Christianity, I know no other they bear about them."

"Ye are friends and allies of our reverend father in God, her, Prior of Jorvaulx," said the monk, without noticing tone of De Bracy’s reply; "ye owe him aid both by lightly faith and holy charity; for what saith the blessed Augustin, in his treatise De Civitate Dei——"

"What saith the devil!" interrupted Front-de-Bœuf; "or what dost thou say, Sir Priest? We have little time bear texts from the holy fathers."

"Sancta Maria!" ejaculated Father Ambrose, "now

DEUS VOBISCU. "God be with you."
DE CIVITATE DEI. "Concerning the city of God"; the title of a famous St. Augustine. (354-430.)
SANCTA MARIA. "Holy Mary!"
prompt to ire are these unhallowed laymen! But be it known to you, brave knights, that certain murderous caitiffs, casting behind them fear of God and reverence of His church, and not regarding the bull of the holy see, Si quis, suadente Diabolo —

"Brother priest," said the Templar, "all this we know or guess at; tell us plainly, is thy master, the Prior, made prisoner, and to whom?"

"Surely," said Ambrose, "he is in the hands of the men of Belial, infester of these woods, and contemners of the holy text, 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets nought of evil.'"

"Here is a new argument for our swords, sirs," said Front-de-Bœuf, turning to his companions; "and so, instead of reaching us any assistance, the Prior of Jorvaulx requests aid at our hands? A man is well helped of these lazy churchmen when he hath most to do! But speak out, priest, and say at once what doth thy master expect from us?"

"So please you," said Ambrose, "violent hands having been imposed on my reverend superior, contrary to the holy ordinance which I did already quote, and the men of Belial having rifled his mails and budgets, and stripped him of two hundred marks of pure refined gold, they do yet demand of him a large sum beside, ere they will suffer him to depart from their uncircumcised hands. Wherefore the reverend father in God prays you, as his dear friends, to rescue him either by paying down the ransom at which they hold him, or by force of arms, at your best discretion."

---

1 CAITIFFS. Wretches; through Norman French from Latin captives, a captive.

2 THE BULL OF THE HOLY SEE. An edict of the Pope is furnished with the seal or bulla of the papal office, and the word, at first designating only the seal, has come to indicate the edict itself. Similarly the see (from Latin sede, a seat), meant originally the chair or throne of a bishop, then his diocese, and lastly the jurisdiction or authority of the papacy itself.

3 Si QUIS, etc. "If any one persuaded by the devil."

4 BELIAL. Satan.

5 TOUCH NOT, etc. See Psalms CV. 15.
The foul fiend quell the Prior!” said Front-de-Bœuf; morning’s draught has been a deep one. When did thy hear of a Norman baron unbuckling his purse to give a churchman, whose bags are ten times as weighty as ? And how can we do aught by valour to free him, are cooped up here by ten times our number, and ex- an assault every moment?” And that was what I was about to tell you,” said the x, “had your hastiness allowed me time. But, God me, I am old, and these foul onslaughts distract an man’s brain. Nevertheless, it is of verity that they able a camp, and raise a bank against the walls of this e.”

To the battlements!” cried De Bracy, “and let us mark these knaves do without” ; and so saying, he opened a red window which led to a sort of bartizan or projecting ny, and immediately called from thence to those in the ment; “St. Denis, but the old monk hath brought true gs! They bring forward mantelets and pavisses,¹ and archers muster on the skirts of the wood like a dark  before a hail-storm.”

Reginald Front-de-Bœuf also looked out upon the field, immediately snatched his bugle; and after winding a and loud blast, commanded his men to their posts on walls.

De Bracy, look to the eastern side where the walls are t. Noble Bois-Guilbert, thy trade hath well taught how to attack and defend, look thou to the western I myself will take post at the barbican. Yet, do not one thy exertions to any one spot, noble friends! We this day be everywhere, and multiply ourselves, were possible, so as to carry by our presence succour and relief ever the attack is hottest. Our numbers are few, but

---

¹ Mantelets were temporary and movable defenses of planks, under cover of which the assailants advanced to the fortifled places of old. Pavisses were a species of large shields for the whole person, employed on the same occasions. [Scott.] activity and courage may supply that defect, since we have only to do with rascal clowns."

"But, noble knights," exclaimed Father Ambrose, amidst the bustle and confusion occasioned by the preparations for defence, "will none of ye hear the message of the reverend father in God, Aymer, Prior of Jorvaulx? I beseech thee to hear me, noble Sir Reginald!"

"Go patter thy petitions to Heaven," said the fierce Norman, "for we on earth have no time to listen to them. Ho! there, Anselm! see that seething pitch and oil are ready to pour on the heads of these audacious traitors. Look that the cross-bowmen lack not bolts. Fling abroad my banner with the old bull's head; the knaves shall soon find with whom they have to do this day!"

"But, noble sir," continued the monk, persevering in his endeavours to draw attention, "consider my vow of obedience, and let me discharge myself of my superior's errand."

"Away with this prating dotard," said Front-de-Boeuf, "lock him up in the chapel to tell his beads till the broil be over. It will be a new thing to the saints in Torquilstone to hear ayes and paters; they have not been so honoured, I trow, since they were cut out of stone."

"Blaspheme not the holy saints, Sir Reginald," said De Bracy, "we shall have need of their aid to-day before ye rascal rout disband."

"I expect little aid from their hand," said Front-de-Boeuf, "unless we were to hurl them from the battlements on the heads of the villains. There is a huge lumbering St Christopher yonder, sufficient to bear a whole company to the earth."

The Templar had in the mean time been looking out on the proceedings of the besiegers, with rather more attention than the brutal Front-de-Boeuf or his giddy companion.

1 BOLTS. The bolt was the arrow peculiarly fitted to the cross-bow, while that of the long-bow was called a shaft. Hence the English proverb, "I will either make a shaft or bolt of it," signifying a determination to make use or other of the thing spoken of. (Scott.)
"By the faith of mine order," he said, "these men approach with more touch of discipline than could have been used, however they come by it. See ye how dexterously they avail themselves of every cover which a tree or bush affords, and shun exposing themselves to the shot of our cross-bows? I spy neither banner nor pennon among them, yet will I gage my golden chain that they are led on by some noble knight or gentleman, skilful in the practice of arms."

"I espy him," said De Bracy; "I see the waving of a knight's crest, and the gleam of his armour. See yon tall man in the black mail, who is busied marshalling the farther edge of the rascaille yeomen; by St. Denis, I hold him to be the same whom we called Le Noir Faineant, who over-saw thee, Front-de-Bœuf, in the lists at Ashby."

"So much the better," said Front-de-Bœuf, "that he here to give me my revenge. Some hilding fellow must be, who dared not stay to assert his claim to the prize which chance had assigned him. I should in this have sought for him where knights and nobles seek their foes, and right glad am I he hath here shown himself among yon villain yeomanry."

The demonstrations of the enemy's immediate approach off all farther discourse. Each knight repaired to his post, and at the head of the few followers whom they were about to muster, and who were in numbers inadequate to defend the whole extent of the walls, they awaited with calm determination the threatened assault.

RASCAILLE. The French original of English "rascal"; the word means ruffianings, refuse.

HILDING. Cowardly.
CHAPTER XXVIII

This wandering race, se'v'rd from other men,
Boast yet their intercourse with human arts;
The seas, the woods, the deserts, which they haunt,
Find them acquainted with their secret treasures:
And unregard'd herbs, and flowers, and blossoms,
Display undreamt-of powers when gather'd by them.

The Jew.

Our history must needs retrograde for the space of a few pages, to inform the reader of certain passages material to his understanding the rest of this important narrative. His own intelligence may indeed have easily anticipated that when Ivanhoe sunk down, and seemed abandoned by all the world, it was the importunity of Rebecca which prevailed on her father to have the gallant young warrior transport from the lists to the house which, for the time, the Jew inhabited in the suburbs of Ashby.

It would not have been difficult to have persuaded Isabella to this step in any other circumstances, for his disposition was kind and grateful. But he had also the prejudices and scrupulous timidity of his persecuted people, and those were to be conquered.

"Holy Abraham!" he exclaimed, "he is a good young man and my heart bleeds to see the gore trickle down his embroidered hacqueton,¹ and his corslet of goodly pride, but to carry him to our house! damsel, hast thou well considered? He is a Christian, and by our law we may not do with the stranger and Gentile, save for the advantage of commerce."

"Speak not so, my dear father," replied Rebecca;

¹ HACQUETON. An under-jacket of soft leather.
not indeed mix with them in banquet and in jollity; in wounds and in misery, the Gentile becometh thes brother."

I would I knew what the Rabbi Jacob Ben Tudela d opine on it," replied Isaac; "nevertheless, the good h must not bleed to death. Let Seth and Reuben bear to Ashby."

"Nay, let them place him in my litter," said Rebecca; "I mount one of the palfreys."

"That were to expose thee to the gaze of those dogs of Israel and of Edom," whispered Isaac, with a suspicious ce towards the crowd of knights and squires. But Re- a was already busied in carrying her charitable purpose effect, and listed not what he said, until Isaac, seizing sleeve of her mantle, again exclaimed, in a hurried e; "Beard of Aaron! what if the youth perish! If he n our custody, shall we not be held guilty of his blood, be torn to pieces by the multitude?"

"He will not die, my father," said Rebecca, gently extr- ing herself from the grasp of Isaac—"he will not die ss we abandon him, and if so, we are indeed answerable his blood to God and to man."

"Nay," said Isaac, releasing his hold, "it grieveth me as h to see the drops of his blood as if they were so many en byzants from mine own purse; and I well know that lessons of Miriam, daughter of the Rabbi Manasses of ntium, whose soul is in Paradise, have made thee skil- n the art of healing, and that thou knowest the craft of s and the force of elixirs. Therefore, do as thou mindh thee: thou art a good damsel—a blessing, and a n, and a song of rejoicing unto me and unto my house, unto the people of my fathers."

The apprehensions of Isaac, however, were not ill ded; and the generous and grateful benevolence of his hter exposed her, on her return to Ashby, to the unhallowed gaze of Brian de Bois-Guilbert. The Templar twice passed and repassed them on the road, fixing his bold and ardent look on the beautiful Jewess; and we have already seen the consequences of the admiration which her charms excited, when accident threw her into the power of that unprincipled voluptuary.

Rebecca lost no time in causing the patient to be transported to their temporary dwelling, and proceeded with her own hands to examine and to bind up his wounds. The youngest reader of romances and romantic ballads must recollect how often the females, during the dark ages, as they are called, were initiated into the mysteries of surgery, and how frequently the gallant knight submitted the wounds of his person to her cure whose eyes had yet more deeply penetrated his heart.

But the Jews, both male and female, possessed and practised the medical science in all its branches, and the monarchs and powerful barons of the time frequently committed themselves to the charge of some experienced sage among this despised people when wounded or in sickness.
 The aid of the Jewish physicians was not the less eagerly sought after, though a general belief prevailed among the Christians that the Jewish rabbins were deeply acquainted with the occult sciences, and particularly with the cabali-stical art, which had its name and origin in the studies of the sages of Israel. Neither did the rabbins disown such acquaintance with supernatural arts, which added nothing—for what could add aught? — to the hatred with which their nation was regarded, while it diminished the contempt with which that malevolence was mingled. A Jewish magician might be the subject of equal abhorrence with a Jewish usurer, but he could not be equally despised. It is, besides, probable, considering the wonderful cures they are said to have performed, that the Jews possessed some secrets of the healing art peculiar to themselves, and which, with the
The beautiful Rebecca had been heedfully brought up in the knowledge proper to her nation, which her apt and erful mind had retained, arranged, and enlarged, in the use of a progress beyond her years, her sex, and even the in which she lived. Her knowledge of medicine and of healing art had been acquired under an aged Jewess, the dughter of one of their most celebrated doctors, who loved recca as her own child, and was believed to have com-icated to her secrets which had been left to herself by sage father at the same time, and under the same circ-stances. The fate of Miriam had indeed been to fall risce to the fanaticism of the times; but her secrets had lived in her apt pupil.

Rebecca, thus endowed with knowledge as with beauty, universally revered and admired by her own tribe, who, ost regarded her as one of those gifted women men- in the sacred history. Her father himself, out of rence for her talents, which involuntarily mingled itself in his unbounded affection, permitted the maiden a ter liberty than was usually indulged to those of her sex he habits of her people, and was, as we have just seen, vently guided by her opinion, even in preference to his

When Ivanhoe reached the habitation of Isaac, he was in a state of unconsciousness, owing to the profuse loss food which had taken place during his exertions in the. Rebecca examined the wound, and having applied to ch vulnerary¹ remedies as her art prescribed, informed her that if fever could be averted, of which the great ning rendered her little apprehensive, and if the healing m of Miriam retained its virtue, there was nothing to for his guest’s life, and that he might with safety travel to York with them on the ensuing day. Isaac looked a little blank at this announcement. His charity would willingly have stopped short at Ashby, or at most would have left the wounded Christian to be tended in the house where he was residing at present, with an assurance to the Hebrew to whom it belonged that all expenses should be duly discharged. To this, however, Rebecca opposed many reasons, of which we shall only mention two that had peculiar weight with Isaac. The one was, that she would on no account put the phial of precious balsam into the hands of another physician even of her own tribe, lest that valuable mystery should be discovered; the other, that this wounded knight, Wilfred of Ivanhoe, was an intimate favourite of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and that, in case the monarch should return, Isaac, who had supplied his brother John with treasure to prosecute his rebellious purposes, would stand in no small need of a powerful protector who enjoyed Richard’s favour.

¹Vulnerary. Useful in healing wounds; Latin vulnus, a wound.

"Thou art speaking but sooth, Rebecca," said Isaac, giving way to these weighty arguments: "it were an offending of Heaven to betray the secrets of the blessed Miriam; for the good which Heaven giveth is not rashly to be squandered upon others, whether it be talents of gold and shekels of silver, or whether it be the secret mysteries of a wise physician; assuredly they should be preserved to those to whom Providence hath vouchsafed them. And him whom the Nazarenes of England call the Lion’s Heart—assuredly it were better for me to fall into the hands of a strong lion of Idumea than into his, if he shall have got assurance of my dealing with his brother. Wherefore I will lend ear to thy counsel, and this youth shall journey with us unto York, and our house shall be as a home to him until his wounds shall be healed. And if he of the Lion Heart shall return to the land, as is now noised abroad, then shall this Wilfred of Ivanhoe be unto me as a wall of defence, when the kind displeasure shall burn high against thy father. And if with not return, this Wilfred may natheless repay us our charges when he shall gain treasure by the strength of his ear and of his sword, even as he did yesterday and this day also. For the youth is a good youth, and keepeth the y which he appointeth, and restareth that which he bor- weth, and succoureth the Israelite, even the child of my ther's house, when he is encompassed by strong thieves d sons of Belial."

It was not until evening was nearly closed that Ivanhoe was restored to consciousness of his situation. He awoke from a broken slumber, under the confused impressions which are naturally attendant on the recovery from a state insensibility. He was unable for some time to recall distinctly to memory the circumstances which had preceded his fall in the lists, or to make out any connected chain of events in which he had been engaged upon the yesterday. Sense of wounds and injury, joined to great weakness and haustion, was mingled with the recollection of blows dealt and received, of steeds rushing upon each other, overthrowing and overturned, of shouts and clashing of arms, and all the heavy tumult of a confused fight. An effort to draw aside the curtain of his couch was in some degree successful, though rendered difficult by the pain of his wound.

To his great surprise, he found himself in a room magnificently furnished, but having cushions instead of chairs rest upon, and in other respects partaking so much of oriental costume that he began to doubt whether he had not, during his sleep, been transported back again to the land of Palestine. The impression was increased when, the tapestry being drawn aside, a female form, dressed in a rich habit, which partook more of the Eastern taste than that of Europe, glided through the door which it concealed, and was followed by a swarthy domestic.

As the wounded knight was about to address this fair parition, she imposed silence by placing her slender finger upon her ruby lips, while the attendant, approaching him, proceeded to uncover Ivanhoe's side, and the lovely Jewess satisfied herself that the bandage was in its place, and the wound doing well. She performed her task with a graceful and dignified simplicity and modesty, which might, even in more civilised days, have served to redeem it from whatever might seem repugnant to female delicacy. The idea of so young and beautiful a person engaged in attendance on a sick-bed, or in dressing the wound of one of a different sex, was melted away and lost in that of a beneficent being contributing her effectual aid to relieve pain, and to avert the stroke of death. Rebecca's few and brief directions were given in the Hebrew language to the old domestic; and he, who had been frequently her assistant in similar cases, obeyed them without reply.

\textit{Natheless.} \textit{Nevertheless.}

The accents of an unknown tongue, however harsh they might have sounded when uttered by another, had, coming from the beautiful Rebecca, the romantic and pleasing effect which fancy ascribes to the charms pronounced by some beneficent fairy, unintelligible, indeed, to the ear, but from the sweetness of utterance and benignity of aspect which accompanied them touching and affecting to the heart. Without making an attempt at further question, Ivanhoe suffered them in silence to take the measures they thought most proper for his recovery; and it was not until those were completed, and this kind physician about to retire, that his curiosity could no longer be suppressed. "Gentle maiden," he began in the Arabian tongue, with which his Eastern travels had rendered him familiar, and which he thought most likely to be understood by the turbaned and caftaned\(^1\) damsel who stood before him, "I pray you, gentle maiden, of your courtesy——"

But here he was interrupted by his fair physician, a smile which she could scarce suppress dimpling for an instant a face whose general expression was that of composure.

---

\(^{1}\) CAFTANED. A CAFTAN is a Persian or Turkish vest with long sleeves.
IVANHOE

sative melancholy. "I am of England, Sir Knight, and speak the English tongue, although my dress and my linge belong to another climate."

"Noble damsel——" again the Knight of Ivanhoe be- m, and again Rebecca hastened to interrupt him.

"Bestow not on me, Sir Knight," she said, "the epithet noble. It is well you should speedily know that your maid-maiden is a poor Jewess, the daughter of that Isaac of York to whom you were so lately a good and kind lord. It will becomes him and those of his household to render to a such careful tendance as your present state necessarily mands."

I know not whether the fair Rowena would have been together satisfied with the species of emotion with which her devoted knight had hitherto gazed on the beautiful features, and fair form, and lustrous eyes of the lovely Rebecca. Her eyes whose brilliancy was shaded, and, as it were, mellowed, by the fringe of her long silken eyelashes, and which minstrel would have compared to the evening star darting rays through a bower of jessamine. But Ivanhoe was too good a Catholic to retain the same class of feelings towards a Jewess. This Rebecca had foreseen, and for this very purpose she had hastened to mention her father's name and lineage; yet—for the fair and wise daughter of Isaac was not without a touch of female weakness—she could not but sigh internally when the glance of respectful admiration, not altogether unmixed with tenderness, with which Ivanhoe had hitherto regarded his unknown benefactress, was exchanged at once for a manner cold, composed, and reflected, and fraught with no deeper feeling than that which expressed a grateful sense of courtesy received from an unexpected quarter, and from one of an inferior race. It was not that Ivanhoe's former carriage expressed more than that general devotional homage which youth always pays to beauty; yet it was mortifying that one word should create as a spell to remove poor Rebecca, who could not supposed altogether ignorant of her title to such homage, into a degraded class, to whom it could not be honourably rendered.

But the gentleness and candour of Rebecca’s nature imputed no fault to Ivanhoe for sharing in the universal prejudices of his age and religion. On the contrary, the fair Jewess, though sensible her patient now regarded her as one of a race of reprobation, with whom it was disgraceful to hold any beyond the most necessary intercourse, ceased not to pay the same patient and devoted attention to his safety and convalescence. She informed him of the necessity they were under of removing to York, and of her father’s resolution to transport him thither, and tend him in his own house until his health should be restored. Ivanhoe expressed great repugnance to this plan, which he grounded on unwillingness to give farther trouble to his benefactors.

“Was there not,” he said, “in Ashby, or near it, some Saxon franklin, or even some wealthy peasant, who would endure the burden of a wounded countryman’s residence with him until he should be again able to bear his armour? Was there no convent of Saxon endowment, where he could be received? Or could he not be transported as far as Burton, where he was sure to find hospitality with Waltheoff, the Abbot of St. Withold’s, to whom he was related?”

“Any, the worst of these harbourages,” said Rebecca, with a melancholy smile, “would unquestionably be more fitting for your residence than the abode of a despised Jew; yet, Sir Knight, unless you would dismiss your physician, you cannot change your lodging. Our nation, as you well know, can cure wounds, though we deal not in inflicting them; and in our own family, in particular, are secrets which have been handed down since the days of Solomon, and of which you have already experienced the advantages. No Nazarene—I crave your forgiveness, Sir Knight—no in leech, within the four seas of Britain, could end to bear your corslet within a month."

And how soon wilt thou enable me to brook it?" said impatiently.

within eight days, if thou wilt be patient and conform my directions," replied Rebecca.

Our Blessed Lady," said Wilfred, "if it be not a sin in her here, it is no time for me or any true knight to tiden; and if thou accomplish thy promise, maiden, thy thee with my casque full of crowns, come by them y.

will accomplish my promise," said Rebecca, "and wilt bear thine armour on the eighth day from hence, wilt grant me but one boon in the stead of the silver promise me."

it be within my power, and such as a true Christian may yield to one of thy people," replied Ivanhoe, grant thy boon blythely and thankfully."

y," answered Rebecca, "I will but pray of thee to henceforward that a Jew may do good service to a n, without desiring other guerdon than the blessing reat Father who made both Jew and Gentile."

were sin to doubt it, maiden," replied Ivanhoe; "and myself on thy skill without further scruple or ques-ll trusting you will enable me to bear my corslet on th day. And now, my kind leech, let me inquire of s abroad. What of the noble Saxon Cedric and his ld? what of the lovely Lady——" He stopt, as lling to speak Rowena’s name in the house of a Jew;

; I mean, who was named Queen of the tourna-

d who was selected by you, Sir Knight, to hold that with judgment which was admired as much as your replied Rebecca.

blood which Ivanhoe had lost did not prevent a.

Used here in the sense of merely.
flush from crossing his cheek, feeling that he had incautiously betrayed his deep interest in Rowena by the awkward attempt he had made to conceal it.

"It was less of her I would speak," said he, "than of Prince John; and I would fain know somewhat of a faithful squire, and why he now attends me not?"

"Let me use my authority as a leech," answered Rebecca, "and enjoin you to keep silence, and avoid agitating reflections, whilst I apprise you of what you desire to know. Prince John hath broken off the tournament, and set forward in all haste towards York, with the nobles, knights, and churchmen of his party, after collecting such sums as they could wring, by fair means or foul, from those who are esteemed the wealthy of the land. It is said he designs to assume his brother's crown."

"Not without a blow struck in its defence," said Ivanhoe, raising himself upon the couch, "if there were but one true subject in England. I will fight for Richard's title with the best of them—ay, one to two, in his just quarrel!"

"But that you may be able to do so," said Rebecca, touching his shoulder with her hand, "you must now observe my directions, and remain quiet."

"True, maiden," said Ivanhoe, "as quiet as these disquieted times will permit. And of Cedric and his household?"

"His steward came but brief while since," said the Jewess, "panting with haste, to ask my father for certain monies, the price of wool the growth of Cedric's flocks, and from him I learned that Cedric and Athelstane of Coningsburgh had left Prince John's lodging in high displeasure, and were about to set forth on their return homeward."

"Went any lady with them to the banquet?" said Wilfred.

"The Lady Rowena," said Rebecca, answering the question with more precision than it had been asked—"the Lady Rowena went not to the Prince's feast, and, as the sun to us, she is now on her journey back to Rother- her guardian Cedric. And touching your faith- Gurth——” exclaimed the knight, “knowest thou his name? dost,” he immediately added, “and well thou it was from thy hand, and, as I am now con- thine own generosity of spirit, that he received day a hundred zecchins.”
IVANHOE

375

th not of that,” said Rebecca, blushing deeply; “I easy it is for the tongue to betray what the heartedly conceal.”

this sum of gold,” said Ivanhoe, gravely, “my concerned in repaying it to your father.”

be as thou wilt,” said Rebecca, “when eight days ed away; but think not, and speak not, now of t may retard thy recovery.”

so, kind maiden,” said Ivanhoe; “I were most l to dispute thy commands. But one word of the Gurth, and I have done with questioning thee.” ere to tell thee, Sir Knight,”” answered the Jewess, s in custody by the order of Cedric.” And then the distress which her communication gave to she instantly added: “But the steward Oswald if nothing occurred to renew his master’s dis- against him, he was sure that Cedric would pardon faithful serf, and one who stood high in favour, ad but committed this error out of the love which o Cedric’s son. And he said, moreover, that he omrades, and especially Wamba, the Jester, were no warn Gurth to make his escape by the way, in c’s ire against him could not be mitigated.”

God they may keep their purpose!” said Ivan- it seems as if I were destined to bring ruin on er hath shown kindness to me. My king, by was honoured and distinguished—thou seest that er most indebted to him is raising his arms to gras his crown; my regard hath brought restraint and trouble on the fairest of her sex; and now my father in his mood may slay this poor bondsman, but for his love and loyal service to me! Thou seest, maiden, what an ill-fated wretch thou dost labour to assist; be wise, and let me go, ere the misfortunes which track my footsteps like slot-hounds¹ shall involve thee also in their pursuit."

"Nay," said Rebecca, "thy weakness and thy grief, Sir Knight, make thee miscalculate the purposes of Heaven. Thou hast been restored to thy country when it most needed the assistance of a strong hand and a true heart, and thou hast humbled the pride of thine enemies and those of thy king, when their horn was most highly exalted; and for the evil which thou hast sustained, seest thou not that Heaven has raised thee a helper and a physician, even among the most despised of the land? Therefore, be of good courage, and trust that thou art preserved for some marvel which thine arm shall work before this people. Adieu; and having taken the medicine which I shall send thee by the hand of Reuben, compose thyself again to rest, that thou mayst be the more able to endure the journey on the succeeding day."

Ivanhoe was convinced by the reasoning, and obeyed the directions of Rebecca. The draught which Reuben administered was of a sedative and narcotic quality, and secured the patient sound and undisturbed slumbers. In the morning his kind physician found him entirely free from feverish symptoms, and fit to undergo the fatigue of a journey.

He was deposited in the horse-litter which had brought him from the lists, and every precaution taken for his travelling with ease. In one circumstance only even the entreaties of Rebecca were unable to secure sufficient attention to the accommodation of the wounded knight. Isaac, like the enriched traveller of Juvenal's Tenth Satire, had

¹ Slot-hounds. Slow-hounds, already described. See note, page 72.
the fear of robbery before his eyes, conscious that he did be alike accounted fair game by the marauding Nor-oble and by the Saxon outlaw. He therefore jour-

A point of view, however, the Jew's haste
d somewhat more than good speed. The rapidity which he insisted on travelling bred several disputes between him and the party whom he had hired to attend as a guard. These men were Saxons, and not free by means from the national love of ease and good living of the Normans stigmatised as laziness and gluttony.
Using Shylock's position, they had accepted the emental in hopes of feeding upon the wealthy Jew, and very much displeased when they found themselves pointed by the rapidity with which he insisted on their feeding. They remonstrated also upon the risk of damger to their horses by these forced marches. Finally, there betwixt Isaac and his satellites a deadly feud concern-the quantity of wine and ale to be allowed for consumat each meal. And thus it happened, that when the of danger approached, and that which Isaac feared likely to come upon him, he was deserted by the dis-ted mercenaries, on whose protection he had relied out using the means necessary to secure their attach-

Atlock's Position. See Merchant of Venice 11. 5. 13.
"But yet I'll go in hate, to feed upon
The prodigal Christian."

But yet I'll go in hate, to feed upon
The prodigal Christian."
ready been noticed, and soon afterwards fell into the of De Bracy and his confederates. Little notice was taken of the horse-litter, and it might have remained be-but for the curiosity of De Bracy, who looked into it the impression that it might contain the object of his prise, for Rowena had not unveiled herself. But De Bracy's astonishment was considerable when he discovered that the litter contained a wounded man, who, con-to have fallen into the power of Saxon outlaws, whom his name might be a protection for himself and friends, frankly avowed himself to be Wilfred of IV-

The ideas of chivalrous honour, which, amidst his ness and levity, never utterly abandoned De Bracy, hibited him from doing the knight any injury in his enceless condition, and equally interdicted his betroment to Front-de-Bœuf, who would have had no scrupput to death, under any circumstances, the rival claim-the fief of Ivanhoe. On the other hand, to liberate a preferred by the Lady Rowena, as the events of the to-ment, and indeed Wilfred's previous banishment from father's house, had made matter of notoriety, was a far above the flight of De Bracy's generosity. A course betwixt good and evil was all which he found it able of adopting, and he commanded two of his quires to keep close by the litter, and to suffer no one to approach it. If questioned, they were directed by master to say that the empty litter of the Lady Rowena employed to transport one of their comrades who had wounded in the scuffle. On arriving at Torquilstone, the Knight Templar and the lord of that castle were intent upon their own schemes, the one on the Jew's ure, and the other on his daughter, De Bracy's squire veyed Ivanhoe, still under the name of a wounded comto a distant apartment. This explanation was accord-returned by these men to Front-de-Bœuf, when he tioned them why they did not make for the battlements upon the alarm.

"A wounded companion!" he replied in great wrath and astonishment. "No wonder that churls and yeomen wax so presumptuous as even to lay leaguer before castles, and that clowns and swineherds send defiances to nobles, since men-at-arms have turned sick men's nurses, and Free Companions are grown keepers of dying folks' curtains, when the castle is about to be assailed. To the battlements, ye rioting villains!" he exclaimed, raising his stentorian voice till the arches around rung again—"to the battlements, or I will splinter your bones with this truncheon!"

The men sulkily replied, "That they desired nothing better than to go to the battlements, providing Front-de-Boeuf would bear them out with their master, who had commanded them to tend the dying man."

"The dying man, knaves!" rejoined the baron; "I promise thee, we shall all be dying men an we stand not to the more stoutly. But I will relieve the guard upon this unfaithful companion of yours. Here, Urfried—hag—fiend of a Saxon witch—hearest me not? Tend me this bedridden fellow, since he must needs be tended, whilst these knaves use their weapons. Here be two arblasts, comrades, with windlases and quarrells—to the Barbican with you, and see you drive each bolt through a Saxon brain."

The men, who, like most of their description, were fond of enterprise and detested inaction, went joyfully to the scene of danger as they were commanded, and thus the charge of Ivanhoe was transferred to Urfried, or Ulrica. But she, whose brain was burning with remembrance of injuries and with hopes of vengeance, was readily induced to devolve upon Rebecca the care of her patient.

---

1 Leaguer. Siege. Compare German Lager, a bed, and English lair; siege itself is from Latin sedeo, to sit; both words therefore are metaphorical.

2 Stentorian. What is the origin of this word?

3 Arblasts. The arblast was a cross-bow, the windlase the machine used in bending that weapon, and the quarrell, so called from its square or diamond-shaped head, was the bolt adapted to it. [Scott.]
CHAPTER XXIX

Ascend the watch-tower yonder, valiant soldier, Look on the field, and say how goes the battle.
Schiller's Maid of Orleans.

A moment of peril is often also a moment of open-hearted kindness and affection. We are thrown off our guard by the general agitation of our feelings, and betray the intensity of those which, at more tranquil periods, our prudence at least conceals, if it cannot altogether suppress them. In finding herself once more by the side of Ivanhoe, Rebecca was astonished at the keen sensation of pleasure which she experienced, even at a time when all around them both was danger, if not despair. As she felt his pulse, and inquired after his health, there was a softness in her touch and in her accents, implying a kinder interest than she would herself have been pleased to have voluntarily expressed. Her voice faltered and her hand trembled, and it was only the cold question of Ivanhoe, "Is it you, gentle maiden?" which recalled her to herself, and reminded her of the sensations which she felt were not and could not be mutual. A sigh escaped, but it was scarce audible; and the questions which she asked the knight concerning his state of health were put in the tone of calm friendship. Ivanhoe answered her hastily that he was, in point of health, as well and better, than he could have expected. "Thanks," he said, "dear Rebecca, to thy helpful skill."

"He calls me dear Rebecca," said the maiden to herself, "but it is in the cold and careless tone which ill suits the word. His war-horse, his hunting hound, are dearer to him than the despised Jewess!"
"My mind, gentle maiden," continued Ivanhoe, "is more disturbed by anxiety than my body with pain. From the speeches of these men who were my warders just now, I learn that I am a prisoner, and, if I judge aright of the loud coarse voice which even now despatched them hence on some military duty, I am in the castle of Front-de-Bœuf. If so, how will this end, or how can I protect Rowena and my father?"

"He names not the Jew or Jewess," said Rebecca, internally; "yet what is our portion in him, and how justly am I punished by Heaven for letting my thoughts dwell upon him?" She hastened after this brief self-accusation to give Ivanhoe what information she could; but it amounted only to this, that the Templar Bois-Guilbert and the Baron Front-de-Bœuf were commanders within the castle; that it was beleaguered from without, but by whom she knew not. She added, that there was a Christian priest within the castle who might be possessed of more information.

"A Christian priest!" said the knight, joyfully; "fetch him hither, Rebecca, if thou canst. Say a sick man desires his ghostly counsel—say what thou wilt, but bring him; something I must do or attempt, but how can I determine until I know how matters stand without?"

Rebecca, in compliance with the wishes of Ivanhoe, made that attempt to bring Cedric into the wounded knight's chamber which was defeated, as we have already seen, by the interference of Urfrid, who had been also on the watch to intercept the supposed monk. Rebecca retired to communicate to Ivanhoe the result of her errand.

They had not much leisure to regret the failure of this source of intelligence, or to contrive by what means it might be supplied; for the noise within the castle, occasioned by the defensive preparations, which had been considerable for some time, now increased into tenfold bustle and clamour. The heavy yet hasty step of the men-at-arms traversed the battlements, or resounded on the narrow and winding passages and stairs which led to the various bartizans and points of defence. The voices of the knights were animating their followers, or directing means of defense while their commands were often drowned in the clash of armour, or the clamorous shouts of those whom they addressed. Tremendous as these sounds were, and more terrible from the awful event which they presented, there was a sublimity mixed with them which Rebecca high-toned mind could feel even in that moment of terror. Her eye kindled, although the blood fled from her cheeks, and there was a strong mixture of fear, and of a triumph of sense of the sublime, as she repeated, half-whispering to herself, half-speaking to her companion, the sacred text: “The quiver ratteth—the glittering spear and the shield the noise of the captains and the shouting!”

But Ivanhoe was like the war-horse of that sublime sage, glowing with impatience at his inactivity, and with ardent desire to mingle in the affray of which these sounds were the introduction. “If I could but drag myself to yonder window, that I might see how this battle-axe to strike were it but a single blow for our deliverance. It is in vain—it is in vain—I am alike nerveless and wanless!”

“Fret not thyself, noble knight,” answered Rebecca, “the sounds have ceased of a sudden; it may be they are not battle.”

“Thou knowest nought of it,” said Wilfred, impatiently, “this dead pause only shows that the men are at their posts on the walls, and expecting an instant attack; what we have heard was but the distant muttering of the storm: it burst anon in all its fury. Could I but reach yonder window!”

“Thou wilt but injure thyself by the attempt, noble knight,” replied his attendant. Observing his expression of} licitude, she firmly added, "I myself will stand at the lattice, and describe to you as I can what passes without."

"You must not—you shall not!" exclaimed Ivanhoe.
Each lattice, each aperture, will be soon a mark for the others; some random shaft——"

"It shall be welcome!" murmured Rebecca, as with firm ness she ascended two or three steps, which led to the window of which they spoke.

"Rebecca—dear Rebecca!" exclaimed Ivanhoe, "this is a maiden’s pastime; do not expose thyself to wounds and death, and render me for ever miserable for having given e occasion; at least, cover thyself with yonder ancient nickel, and show as little of your person at the lattice as may be."

Following with wonderful promptitude the directions of Ivanhoe, and availing herself of the protection of the large ancient shield, which she placed against the lower part of the window, Rebecca, with tolerable security to herself, would witness part of what was passing without the castle, and report to Ivanhoe the preparations which the assailants were making for the storm. Indeed, the situation which she thus obtained was peculiarly favourable for this purpose, because, being placed on an angle of the main building, Rebecca could not only see what passed beyond the rectangular of the castle, but also commanded a view of the outwork likely to be the first object of the meditated assault.
It was an exterior fortification of no great height or strength, intended to protect the postern-gate, through which Cedric had been recently dismissed by Front-de-nœuf. The castle moat divided this species of barbican from the rest of the fortress, so that, in case of its being taken, it was easy to cut off the communication with the main building, by withdrawing the temporary bridge. In the outwork was a sallyport corresponding to the postern of the castle, and the whole was surrounded by a strong palis-dade. Rebecca could observe, from the number of men placed for the defence of this post, that the besieged tained apprehensions for its safety; and from the musk of the assailants in a direction nearly opposite to the work, it seemed no less plain that it had been selected vulnerable point of attack.

These appearances she hastily communicated to hoe, and added, "The skirts of the woods seem lined archers, although only a few are advanced from its shadow."

"Under what banner?" asked Ivanhoe.
"Under no ensign of war which I can observe," ans Rebecca.

"A singular novelty," muttered the knight, "to ad
to storm such a castle without pennon or banner displ Seest thou who they be that act as leaders?"

"A knight, clad in sable armour, is the most con uous," said the Jewess; "he alone is armed from he heel, and seems to assume the direction of all around

"What device does he bear on his shield?" replied hoe.

"Something resembling a bar of iron, and a pai painted blue on the black shield."¹

"A fetterlock and shacklebolt azure,"² said Ivan
"I know not who may bear the device, but well I we might now be mine own. Canst thou not see the mo

"Scarce the device itself at this distance," replied becca; "but when the sun glances fair upon his shi shows as I tell you."

"Seem there no other leaders?" exclaimed the an inquirer.

"None of mark and distinction that I can behol
this station," said Rebecca; "but doubtless the oth of the castle is also assailed. They appear even now

¹ SHIELD. See Appendix, note F. [Scott.]
² A fetterlock, etc. The fetterlock was an attachment for h of horses, and a shacklebolt was similar. The device of fette might appropriately enough serve the humor of the disguised kni transpire later on.
IVANHOE

...ing to advance—God of Zion protect us! What a dreadful! Those who advance first bear huge shields and faces made of plank; the others follow, bending their as they come on. They raise their bows! God of us, forgive the creatures Thou hast made!

Her description was here suddenly interrupted by the

for assault, which was given by the blast of a shrill

e, and at once answered by a flourish of the Norman pets from the battlements, which, mingled with the and hollow clang of the nakers (a species of kettles-)

, retorted in notes of defiance the challenge of the

y. The shouts of both parties augmented the fearful

the assailants crying, "St. George for merry England!"

the Normans answering them with loud cries of "En

De Bracy! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! Front-det à la rescousse!" according to the war-cries of their rent commanders.

ot was not, however, by clamour that the contest was de decided, and the desperate efforts of the assailants met by an equally vigorous defence on the part of the

d. The archers, trained by their woodland pastimes most effective use of the long-bow, shot, to use the propriate phrase of the time, so "wholly together," that oint at which a defender could show the least part of erson escaped their cloth-yard shafts. By this heavy arge, which continued as thick and sharp as hail,

e, notwithstanding, every arrow had its individual aim,

lew by scores together against each embrasure and

ing in the parapets, as well as at every window where a nder either occasionally had post, or might be suspected ationed—by this sustained discharge, two or three arrison were slain and several others wounded. But, ent in their armour of proof, and in the cover which situation afforded, the followers of Front-de-Bœuf

AVANT. "Forward!"

LA RESCOUSSE. "To the rescue!"
and his allies showed an obstinacy in defence proportioned to the fury of the attack, and replied with the discharge of their large cross-bows, as well as with their long-bows, slings, and other missile weapons, to the close and continued shower of arrows; and, as the assailants were necessarily but indifferently protected, did considerably more damage than they received at their hand. The whizzing of shafts and of missiles on both sides was only interrupted by the shouts which arose when either side inflicted or sustained some notable loss.

“And I must lie here like a bedridden monk,” exclaimed Ivanhoe, “while the game that gives me freedom or death is played out by the hand of others! Look from the window once again, kind maiden, but beware that you are not marked by the archers beneath. Look out once more, and tell me if they yet advance to the storm.”

With patient courage, strengthened by the interval which she had employed in mental devotion, Rebecca again took post at the lattice, sheltering herself, however, so as not to be visible from beneath.

“What dost thou see, Rebecca?” again demanded the wounded knight.

“Nothing but the cloud of arrows flying so thick as to dazzle mine eyes, and to hide the bowmen who shoot them.”

“That cannot endure,” said Ivanhoe; “if they press not right on to carry the castle by pure force of arms, the archery may avail but little against stone walls and bulwarks. Look for the Knight of the Fetterlock, fair Rebecca, and see how he bears himself; for as the leader is, so will his followers be.”

“I see him not,” said Rebecca.

“Foul craven!” exclaimed Ivanhoe; “does he blench from the helm when the wind blows highest?”

“He blenches not!—he blenches not!” said Rebecca. “I see him now; he leads a body of men close under the er barrier of the barbican. They pull down the piles and pikes; they hew down the barriers with axes. His high plume floats abroad over the throng, like a raven over field of the slain. They have made a breach in the bars—they rush in—they are thrust back! Front-de-Bœuf nds the defenders; I see his gigantic form above the ss. They throng again to the breach, and the pass is outed hand to hand, and man to man. God of Jacob!
s the meeting of two fierce tides—the conflict of two ans moved by adverse winds!”

She turned her head from the lattice, as if unable longer
ure a sight so terrible.

“Look forth again, Rebecca,” said Ivanhoe, mistaking cause of her retiring; “the archery must in some degree
ese ceased, since they are now fighting hand to hand.
ok again, there is now less danger.”

Rebecca again looked forth, and almost immediately aimed, “Holy prophets of the law! Front-de-Bœuf and Black Knight fight hand to hand on the breach, amid roar of their followers, who watch the progress of the . Heaven strike with the cause of the oppressed and the captive!” She then uttered a loud shriek, and exed, “He is down!—he is down!”

“Who is down?” cried Ivanhoe; “for our dear Lady’s
e, tell me which has fallen?”

“The Black Knight,” answered Rebecca, faintly; thentantly again shouted with joyful eagerness: “But no—
o! the name of the Lord of Hosts be blessed! he is on again, and fights as if there were twenty men’s strength his single arm. His sword is broken—he snatches an from a yeoman—he presses Front-de-Bœuf with blow

1Barbican. Every Gothic castle and city had, beyond the outer-walls, a ication composed of palisades, called the barriers, which were often the of severe skirmishes, as these must necessarily be carried before the themselves could be approached. Many of those valiant feats of arms adorn the chivalrous pages of Froissart took place at the barriers of ed places. [Scott.]
on blow. The giant stoops and totters like an oak under the steel of the woodman—he falls—he falls!"

"Front-de-Bœuf?" exclaimed Ivanhoe.

"Front-de-Bœuf," answered the Jewess. "His men rush to the rescue, headed by the haughty Templar; their united force compels the champion to pause. They drag Front-de-Bœuf within the walls."

"The assailants have won the barriers, have they not," said Ivanhoe.

"They have—they have!" exclaimed Rebecca; "and press the besieged hard upon the outer wall; some planters, some swarm like bees, and endeavour to ascend to the shoulders of each other; down go stones, beams, trunks of trees upon their heads, and as fast as they are wounded to the rear, fresh men supply their place of the assault. Great God! hast Thou given men Thine image that it should be thus cruelly defaced by the hand of their brethren!"

"Think not of that," said Ivanhoe; "this is no time for such thoughts. Who yield? who push their way?"

"The ladders are thrown down," replied Rebecca, shuddering; "the soldiers lie grovelling under them like crushed reptiles. The besieged have the better."

"St. George strike for us!" exclaimed the knight; "the false yeomen give way?"

"No!" exclaimed Rebecca, "they bear themselves no yeomanly. The Black Knight approaches the postern with his huge axe; the thundering blows which he deals, may hear them above all the din and shouts of the battle. Stones and beams are hailed down on the bold champion; he regards them no more than if they were thistle-down feathers!"

"By St. John of Acre," said Ivanhoe, raising himself joyfully on his couch, "methought there was but one man in England that might do such a deed!"

"The postern gate shakes," continued Rebecca—ues—it is splintered by his blows—they rush in—the work is won. O God! they hurl the defenders from the tlements—they throw them into the moat. O men, if be indeed men, spare them that can resist no longer!"

"The bridge—the bridge which communicates with the ile—have they won that pass?" exclaimed Ivanhoe.

"No," replied Rebecca; "the Templar has destroyed the ink on which they crossed; few of the defenders escaped him into the castle—the shrieks and cries which you or tell the fate of the others. Alas! I see it is still more difficult to look upon victory than upon battle."

"What do they now, maiden?" said Ivanhoe; "look forth again—this is no time to faint at bloodshed."

"It is over for the time," answered Rebecca; "our ends strengthen themselves within the outwork which we have mastered, and it affords them so good a shelter the foemen's shot that the garrison only bestow a few ts on it from interval to interval, as if rather to disquiet n effectually to injure them."

"Our friends," said Wilfred, "will surely not abandon enterprise so gloriously begun and so happily attained. no! I will put my faith in the good knight whose axe heart-of-oak and bars of iron. Singular," he in muttered to himself, "if there be two who can do a d of such derring-do! A fetterlock, and a shacklebolt field sable—what may that mean? Seest thou nought Rebecca, by which the Black Knight may be distin-

"Nothing," said the Jewess; "all about him is black as wing of the night raven. Nothing can I spy that can k him further; but having once seen him put forth his length in battle, methinks I could know him again among thousand warriors. He rushes to the fray as if he were sioned to a banquet. There is more than mere strength here seems as if the whole soul and spirit of the char-

DERRING-DO. Desperate courage. [Scott.]
pion were given to every blow which he deals upon his enemies. God assolzie¹ him of the sin of bloodshed! It is fearful, yet magnificent, to behold how the arm and heart of one man can triumph over hundreds.”

“Rebecca,” said Ivanhoe, “thou hast painted a hero; surely they rest but to refresh their force, or to provide the means of crossing the moat. Under such a leader as thou hast spoken this knight to be, there are no craven fears, no cold-blooded delays, no yielding up a gallant emprize, since the difficulties which render it arduous render it also glorious. I swear by the honour of my house—I vow by the name of my bright lady-love, I would endure ten years’ captivity to fight one day by that good knight’s side in such a quarrel as this!”

“Alas!” said Rebecca, leaving her station at the window, and approaching the couch of the wounded knight.
“this impatient yearning after action—this struggling with and repining at your present weakness, will not fail to injure your returning health. How couldst thou hope to inflict wounds on others, ere that be healed which thou thyself hast received?”

“Rebecca,” he replied, “thou knowest not how impossible it is for one trained to actions of chivalry to remain passive as a priest, or a woman, when they are acting deeds of honour around him. The love of battle is the food upon which we live—the dust of the mêlée² is the breath of our nostrils! We live not—we wish not to live—longer than while we are victorious and renowned. Such, maiden, are the laws of chivalry to which we are sworn, and to which we offer all that we hold dear.”

“Alas!” said the fair Jewess, “and what is it, valiant knight, save an offering of sacrifice to a demon of vain glory and a passing through the fire to Moloch? What remains to you as the prize of all the blood you have spilled, of all

¹ Assolzie. Absolve, forgive.
² Mêlée. Crowded and confused fighting.
the travail and pain you have endured, of all the tears which our deeds have caused, when death hath broken the strong man’s spear, and overthrown the speed of his war-horse?”

“What remains?” cried Ivanhoe. “Glory, maiden—glory! which gilds our sepulchre and embalms our name.”

“Glory!” continued Rebecca; “alas! is the rusted mail which hangs as a hatchment over the champion’s dim and buldering tomb, is the defaced sculpture of the inscription which the ignorant monk can hardly read to the insiring pilgrim—are these sufficient rewards for the sacrifice of every kindly affection, for a life spent miserably that may make others miserable? Or is there such virtue in the rude rhymes of a wandering bard, that domestic love, kindly affection, peace and happiness, are so wildly barred, to become the hero of those ballads which vagabond minstrels sing to drunken churls over their evening ale?”

“By the soul of Hereward!” replied the knight, impatiently, “thou speakest, maiden, of thou knowest not what. wouldst quench the pure light of chivalry, which one distinguishes the noble from the base, the gentle light from the churl and the savage; which rates our life or, far beneath the pitch of our honour, raises us victorious over pain, toil, and suffering, and teaches us to fear no evil but disgrace. Thou art no Christian, Rebecca; and to thee are unknown those high feelings which swell the bosom of a noble maiden when her lover hath done some deed of uprise which sanctions his flame. Chivalry! Why, maiden, she is the nurse of pure and high affection, the stay of the oppressed, the redresser of grievances, the curb of the power of the tyrant. Nobility were but an empty name without her, and liberty finds the best protection in her face and her sword.”

“I am indeed,” said Rebecca, “sprung from a race whose rage was distinguished in the defence of their own land,

_Hatchment._ A funeral decoration displaying the coat-of-arms of the deceased, placed before the residence or over the hearse or tomb.
but who warred not, even while yet a nation, save at the command of the Deity, or in defending their country from oppression. The sound of the trumpet wakes Judah no longer, and her despised children are now but the unresisting victims of hostile and military oppression. Well hast thou spoken, Sir Knight: until the God of Jacob shall ris-up for His chosen people a second Gideon, or a new Macabeus, it ill beseemeth the Jewish damsel to speak of battle or of war."

The high-minded maiden concluded the argument in tone of sorrow, which deeply expressed her sense of the degradation of her people, embittered perhaps by the fact that Ivanhoe considered her as one not entitled to interin a case of honour, and incapable of entertaining or expressing sentiments of honour and generosity.

"How little he knows this bosom," she said, "to imagine that cowardice or meanness of soul must needs be its because I have censured the fantastic chivalry of the Na-renes! Would to Heaven that the shedding of mine own blood, drop by drop, could redeem the captivity of Judah!
Nay, would to God it could avail to set free my father, and this his benefactor, from the chains of the oppressor! To proud Christian should then see whether the daughter of God's chosen people dared not to die as bravely as the va-est Nazarene maiden, that boasts her descent from so petty chieftain of the rude and frozen north!"

She then looked towards the couch of the wounded knight.

"He sleeps," she said; "nature exhausted by suffer-and the waste of spirits, his wearied frame embraces the first moment of temporary relaxation to sink into slumber.
Alas! is it a crime that I should look upon him, when it may be for the last time? When yet but a short space, and the fair features will be no longer animated by the bold at 1 Maccaebucus. A champion of the Hebrew nation (175-164 B.C.) and founder of a line of kings.

rant spirit which forsakes them not even in sleep! in the nostril shall be distended, the mouth agape, the fixed and bloodshot; and when the proud and noble may be trodden on by the lowest caitiff of this acc castle, yet stir not when the heel is lifted up against And my father!—oh, my father! evil is it with his enter, when his grey hairs are not remembered because the golden locks of youth! What know I but that these are the messengers of Jehovah’s wrath to the unchild who thinks of a stranger’s captivity before a it’s? who forgets the desolation of Judah, and looks the comeliness of a Gentile and a stranger? But I fear this folly from my heart, though every fibre bleed end it away!”

she wrapped herself closely in her veil, and sat down distance from the couch of the wounded knight, with back turned towards it, fortifying, or endeavouring to ry, her mind not only against the impending evils from out, but also against those treacherous feelings which ed her from within.
CHAPTER XXX

Approach the chamber, look upon his bed,
His is the passing of no peaceful ghost,
Which, as the lark arises to the sky,
'Mid morning's sweetest breeze and softest dew,
Is wing'd to heaven by good men's sighs and tears!
Anselm parts otherwise.

Old Play.

During the interval of quiet which followed the success of the besiegers, while the one party was prepared to pursue their advantage and the other to strengthen the means of defence, the Templar and De Bracy held their counsel together in the hall of the castle.

"Where is Front-de-Bœuf?" said the latter, who superintended the defence of the fortress on the other side. "Men say he hath been slain."

"He lives," said the Templar, coolly—"lives as yet; had he worn the bull's head of which he bears the mark, and ten plates of iron to fence it withal, he must have given way to the pressure of the enemy long before yonder fatal axe. Yet a few hours, and Front-de-Bœuf is with his fathers—a powerful limb lopped from the tree of Prince John's enterprise."

"And a brave addition to the kingdom of Satan," said De Bracy; "this comes of reviling saints and angels, ordering images of holy things and holy men to be flung down on the heads of these rascaille yeomen."

"Go to, thou art a fool," said the Templar; "thysupposition is upon a level with Front-de-Bœuf's want of faith; neither of you can render a reason for your belief or unbelief."

"Benedicite, Sir Templar," replied De Bracy; "Benedicite. "Bless you."

\[1\] Benedicite. "Bless you."
u to keep better rule with your tongue when I am the name of it. By the Mother of Heaven, I am a better Christian man than thou and thy fellowship; for the bruit\(^1\) goeth crwdly out, that the most holy order of the Temple of nurseth not a few heretics within its bosom, and that Brian de Bois-Guilbert is of the number."

"Care not thou for such reports," said the Templar;
but let us think of making good the castle. How fought ese villain yeomen on thy side?"

"Like fiends incarnate," said De Bracy. "They armed close up to the walls, headed, as I think, by the ave who won the prize at the archery, for I knew his horn
d baldrick. And this is old Fitzurse's boasted policy, en-uraging these malapert\(^2\) knaves to rebel against us! Had not been armed in proof, the villain had marked me down ten times with as little remorse as if I had been a buck in ison. He told every rivet on my armour with a cloth-yard aff, that rapped against my ribs with as little compunc-on as if my bones had been of iron. But that I wore a irt of Spanish mail under my plate-coat, I had been fairly ed."

"But you maintained your post?" said the Templar.
'st lost the outwork on our part."

"That is a shrewd loss," said De Bracy; "the knaves will cover there to assault the castle more closely, and may,
ot well watched, gain some unguarded corner of a tower, some forgotten window, and so break in upon us. Our bers are too few for the defence of every point, and the complain that they can nowhere show themselves, but y are the mark for as many arrows as a parish-butt\(^3\) on tolyday even. Front-de-Bœuf is dying too, so we shall ve no more aid from his bull's head and brutal length. How think you, Sir Brian, were we not better

\(^{1}\text{bruit}: \text{Rumor.}\)
\(^{2}\text{malapert}: \text{Impertinent.}\)
\(^{3}\text{butt}: \text{A target for use in archery.}\) make a virtue of necessity, and compound with the rogues by delivering up our prisoners?"

"How!" exclaimed the Templar; "deliver up our prisoners, and stand an object alike of ridicule and execration, as the doughty warriors who dared by a night-attack to possess themselves of the persons of a party of defenceless travellers, yet could not make good a strong castle against a vagabond troop of outlaws, led by swineherds, jesters, and the very refuse of mankind? Shame on thy counsel, Maurice De Bracy! The ruins of this castle shall bury both my body and my shame, ere I consent to such base and dishonourable composition."

"Let us to the walls, then," said De Bracy, carelessly; "that man never breathed, be he Turk or Templar, who held life at lighter rate than I do. But I trust there is no dishonour in wishing I had here some two scores of my gallant troop of Free Companions? Oh, my brave lances! if ye knew but how hard your captain were this day bested, how soon should I see my banner at the head of your clump of spears! And how short while would these rabble villains stand to endure your encounter?"

"Wish for whom thou wilt," said the Templar, "but let us make what defence we can with the soldiers who remain. They are chiefly Front-de-Bœuf's followers, hated by the English for a thousand acts of insolence and oppression."

"The better," said De Bracy; "the rugged slaves will defend themselves to the last drop of their blood, ere they encounter the revenge of the peasants without. Let us up and be doing, then, Brian de Bois-Guilbert; and, live or die, thou shalt see Maurice de Bracy bear himself this day as a gentleman of blood and lineage."

"To the walls!" answered the Templar; and they both ascended the battlements to do all that skill could dictate and manhood accomplish, in defence of the place. They readily agreed that the point of greatest danger was the opposite to the outwork of which the assailants had ased themselves. The castle, indeed, was divided from at barbican by the moat, and it was impossible that the siegers, could assail the postern door, with which the out-rok corresponded, without surmounting that obstacle; but was the opinion both of the Templar and De Bracy that the siegers, if governed by the same policy their leader had ready displayed, would endeavour, by a formidable as-ult, to draw the chief part of the defenders’ observation this point, and take measures to avail themselves of every ligence which might take place in the defence elsewhere.
To guard against such an evil, their numbers only pertted the knights to place sentinels from space to space ng the walls in communication with each other, who ght give the alarm whenever danger was threatened.
meanwhile, they agreed that De Bracy should command the defence at the postern, and the Templar should keep him a score of men or thereabouts as a body of reserve, ady to hasten to any other point which might be sudonly threatened. The loss of the barbican had also this fortunate effect, that, notwithstanding the superior ight of the castle walls, the besieged could not see from en, with the same precision as before, the operations of enemy; for some straggling underwood approached so ar the sallyport of the outwork that the assailants might roduce into it whatever force they thought proper, not ly under cover, but even without the knowledge of the defenders. Utterly uncertain, therefore, upon what point storm was to burst, De Bracy and his companion were ider the necessity of providing against every possible con-ency, and their followers, however brave, experienced anxious dejection of mind incident to men inclosed by emies, who possessed the power of choosing their time
ed mode of attack.

Meanwhile, the lord of the beleaguered and endangered lay upon a bed of bodily pain and mental agony. He had not the usual resource of bigots in that superstitious period, most of whom were wont to atone for their neglect of the church, by purchasing a refuge which they purchased because their consciences were not easier then to the peace of mind which it was still a state of mind preferable to the age of health and natural sleep. But among the vices of Front-de-Bœuf, the most predominant was avarice; and the vices of the Templars, of another stamp, justly characterise his associate who said Front-de-Bœuf could assign no cause for his unbelief and contempt for the established faith. For the baron have alleged that the church sold her wares too dearly. The spirit of the church, which she put up for sale was a great sum, and Front-de-Bœuf preferred the virtue of the medicine to paying the expense of the physician.

But the moment had now arrived when earth and treasures were gliding from before his eyes, and the Savage baron's heart, though hard as a nether millstone, became appalled as he gazed forward into the wastefulness of futurity. The fever of his body aided the impotence and agony of his mind, and his death-bed exhibited a fearful state of mind, only to be equalled in the tremendous regions where there are complaints without remedy without repentance, a dreadful sense of pain and agony, and a presentiment that it cannot cease or be

** With a Great Sum. See Acts XXII. 23.*
Where be these dog-priests now,” growled the baron, “set such price on their ghostly mummery?—where be those unholy Carmelites, for whom old Front-de-Bœuf paid the convent of St. Anne, robbing his heir of many a rood of meadow, and many a fat field and close—be the greedy hounds now? Swilling, I warrant me, in ale, or playing their juggling tricks at the bedside of some miserly churl. Me, the heir of their founder—whom their foundation binds them to pray for—me—tateful villains as they are!—they suffer to die like the eless dog on yonder common, unshriven and unhoused! Tell the Templar to come hither; he is a priest, may do something. But no! as well confess myself to evil as to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, who recks neither of en nor of Hell. I have heard old men talk of prayer—er by their own voice—such need not to court or to the false priest. But I—I dare not!”

Lives Reginald Front-de-Bœuf,” said a broken and voice close by his bedside, “to say there is that which res not?”

He evil conscience and the shaken nerves of Front-de-Bœuf, he heard, in this strange interruption to his soliloquy, voice of one of those demons who, as the superstition e times believed, beset the beds of dying men, to dis— their thoughts, and turn them from the meditations concerned their eternal welfare. He shuddered and himself together; but, instantly summoning up his ed resolution, he exclaimed, “Who is there? what art that darest to echo my words in a tone like that of the raven? Come before my couch that I may see thee.” I am thine evil angel, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf,” re— the voice.

Let me behold thee then in thy bodily shape, if thou indeed a fiend,” replied the dying knight; “think not I will bлечh from thee. By the eternal dungeon, could I but grapple with these horrors that hover round me as I have done with mortal dangers, Heaven or Hell should never say that I shrunk from the conflict!"

"Think on thy sins, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf," said the almost unearthly voice—"on rebellion, on rapine, on murder! Who stirred up the licentious John to war against his grey-headed father—against his generous brother?"

"Be thou fiend, priest, or devil," replied Front-de-Bœuf, "thou liest in thy throat! Not I stirred John to rebellion—not I alone; there were fifty knights and barons, the flower of the midland counties, better men never laid lance in rest. And must I answer for the fault done by fifty? False fiend, I defy thee! Depart, and haunt my couch no more. Let me die in peace if thou be mortal; if thou be a demon, thy time is not yet come."

"In peace thou shalt not die," repeated the voice; "even in death shalt thou think on thy murders—on the groans which this castle has echoed—on the blood that is engrained in its floors!"

"Thou canst not shake me by thy petty malice," answered Front-de-Bœuf, with a ghastly and constrained laugh. "The infidel Jew—it was merit with Heaven to deal with him as I did, else wherefore are men canonised who did their hands in the blood of the Saracens? The Saxon peregriners whom I have slain—they were the foes of my country and of my lineage, and of my liege lord. Ho! ho! thou seest there is no crevice in my coat of plate. Art thou fled? art thou silenced?"

"No, foul parricide!" replied the voice; "think of thy father!—think of his death!—think of his banquet-room flooded with his gore, and that poured forth by the hand of a son!"

"Ha!" answered the Baron, after a long pause, "am that knowest that, thou art indeed the Author of Evil, and as omniscient as the monks call thee! That secret I deemed locked in my own breast, and in that of one besides—" tress, the partaker of my guilt. Go, leave me, fiend! seek the Saxon witch Ulrica, who alone could tell thee she and I alone witnessed. Go, I say, to her, who shed the wounds, and straightened the corpse, and gave the slain man the outward show of one parted in time in the course of nature. Go to her; she was my tempthe foul provoker, the more foul rewarder, of the let her, as well as I, taste of the tortures which antici-

Hell!”

She already tastes them,” said Ulrica, stepping before mouch of Front-de-Bœuf; “she hath long drunken of up, and its bitterness is now sweetened to see that thou partake it. Grind not thy teeth, Front-de-Bœuf—roll shine eyes—clench not thy hand, nor shake it at me that gesture of menace! The hand which, like that of enowned ancestor who gained thy name, could have with one stroke the skull of a mountain-bull, is now ed and powerless as mine own!”

Vile, murderous hag!” replied Front-de-Bœuf—“de-ble screech-owl! it is then thou who art come to exult the ruins thou hast assisted to lay low?”

Ay, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf,” answered she, “it is a!—it is the daughter of the murdered Torquil Wolfer!—it is the sister of his slaughtered sons! it is she demands of thee, and of thy father’s house, father and ed, name and fame—all that she has lost by the name oint-de-Bœuf! Think of my wrongs, Front-de-Bœuf, answer me if I speak not truth. Thou hast been my angel, and I will be thine: I will dog thee till the very out of dissolution!”

Detestable fury!” exclaimed Front-de-Bœuf, “that mo-shall thou never witness. Ho! Giles, Clement, and ace! St. Maur and Stephen! seize this damned witch, hurl her from the battlements headlong; she has bed us to the Saxon! Ho! St. Maur! Clement! false-ked knaves, where tarry ye?”

“Call on them again, valiant baron,” said the hag, with a smile of grisly mockery; “summon thy vassals around thee, doom them that loiter to the scourge and the dungeon. But know, mighty chief,” she continued, suddenly changing her tone, “thou shalt have neither answer, nor aid, obedience at their hands. Listen to these horrid sounds for the din of the recommenced assault and defence. The rung fearfully loud from the battlements of the castle; that war-cry is the downfall of thy house. The blood-cemented fabric of Front-de-Bœuf’s power totters to foundation, and before the foes he most despised! Saxon, Reginald!—the scorned Saxon assails thy wall. Why liest thou here, like a worn-out hind, when the Saxon storms thy place of strength?”

“Gods and fiends!” exclaimed the wounded knight. “Oh, for one moment’s strength, to drag myself to mêlée, and perish as becomes my name!”

“Think not of it, valiant warrior!” replied she; “thou shalt die no soldier’s death, but perish like the fox hidden, when the peasants have set fire to the cover around thee.”

“Hateful hag! thou liest!” exclaimed Front-de-Bœuf. “My followers bear them bravely—my walls are strong and high—my comrades in arms fear not a whole host of Saxons, were they headed by Hengist and Horsa! The war-cry of the Templar and of the Free Companions rises high over the conflict. And by mine honour, when we kindle the blazing beacon for joy of our defence, it shall consume the body and bones; and I shall live to hear thou art gone from earthly fires to those of that Hell which never sent for an incarnate fiend more utterly diabolical!”

“Hold thy belief,” replied Ulrica, “till the proof rea... through the chamber? Didst thou think it was but the tickling of thy bursting eyes, the difficulty of thy cumpled breathing? No! Front-de-Bœuf, there is another use. Rememberest thou the magazine of fuel that is bed beneath these apartments?"

“Woman!” he exclaimed with fury, “thou hast not set te to it? By Heaven, thou hast, and the castle is in mes!”

“They are fast rising at least,” said Ulrica, with frightcomposure; “and a signal shall soon wave to warn the siegers to press hard upon those who would extinguish em. Farewell, Front-de-Bœuf! May Mista, Skogula, and orner, gods of the ancient Saxons—fiends, as the iests now call them—supply the place of comforters at ur dying bed, which Ulrica now relinquishes! But know, it will give thee comfort to know it, that Ulrica is bound

the same dark coast with thyself, the companion of thy ishment as the companion of thy guilt. And now, parcide, farewell forever! May each stone of this vaulted of find a tongue to echo that title into thine ear!”

So saying, she left the apartment; and Front-de-Bœuf ould hear the crash of the ponderous key as she locked double-locked the door behind her, thus cutting off

most slender chance of escape. In the extremity of ony, he shouted upon his servants and allies: “Stephen

d St. Maur! Clement and Giles! I burn here unaided!

the rescue—to the rescue, brave Bois-Guilbert, valiant Bracy! It is Front-de-Bœuf who calls! It is your mas-ye traitor squires! Your ally—your brother in arms, jerred and faithless knights! All the curses due to itors upon your recreant heads, do you abandon me to ish thus miserably! They hear me not—they cannot r me—my voice is lost in the din of battle. The smoke thicker and thicker, the fire has caught upon the floor.

l. Oh, for one draught of the air of heaven, were it purchased by instant annihilation!” And in the ma frenzy of despair, the wretch now shouted with the shouts of the fighters, now muttered curses on himself, on mankind, and on Heaven itself. "The red fire flashes through the thick smoke!" he exclaimed; "the demon marches against me under the banner of his own element. Foul spirit, avoid! I go not with thee without my comrades—all, all are thine that garrison these walls. Thinkest thou Front-de-Bœuf will be singled out to go alone? No; the infidel Templar, the licentious De Bracy, Ulrica, the foul murdering strumpet, the men who aided my enterprises, the dog Saxons and accursed Jews who are my prisoners—all, all shall attend me—a goodly fellowship as ever took the downward road. Ha, ha, ha!" and he laughed in his frenzy till the vaulted roof rang again. "Who laughed there?" exclaimed Front-de-Bœuf, in altered mood, for the noise of the conflict did not prevent the echoes of his own mad laughter from returning upon his ear—"who laughed there? Ulrica, was it thou? Speak, witch, and I forgive thee; for only thou or the Fiend of Hell himself could have laughed at such a moment. Avaunt—avaunt——!"

But it were impious to trace any farther the picture of the blasphemer and parricide’s death-bed.
CHAPTER XXXI

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more,
Or close the wall up with our English dead.
... And you, good yeomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture—let us swear
That you are worth your breeding.

King Henry V.

Cedric, although not greatly confident in Ulrica’s mes-ge, omitted not to communicate her promise to the Black night and Locksley. They were well pleased to find they d a friend within the place, who might, in the moment need, be able to facilitate their entrance, and readily reed with the Saxon that a storm, under whatever dis-avantages, ought to be attempted, as the only means of erating the prisoners now in the hands of the cruel Front-

“The royal blood of Alfred is endangered,” said Cedric.
“The honour of a noble lady is in peril,” said the Black night.

“And, by the St. Christopher at my baldric,” said the good yeoman, “were there no other cause than the safety that poor faithful knave, Wamba, I would jeopard a joint e a hair of his head were hurt.”

“And so would I,” said the Friar; “*what sirs! I trust all that a fool—I mean, d’ye see me, sirs, a fool that is of his guild¹ and master of his craft, and can give as much relish and flavour to a cup of wine as ever a fitch² of ton can—I say, brethren, such a fool shall never want a

¹ Free of His Guild. With all the liberties and privileges granted his ² Fitch. The side of a hog, cured.
wise clerk to pray for or fight for him at a strait, while I can say a mass or flourish a partizan."

And with that he made his heavy halberd to play around his head as a shepherd boy flourishes his light crook.

"True, holy clerk," said the Black Knight—"true as if St. Dunstan himself had said it. And now, good Locksley, were it not well that noble Cedric should assume the direction of this assault?"

"Not a jot I," returned Cedric; "I have never been wont to study either how to take or how to hold out those abodes of tyrannic power which the Normans have erected in this groaning land. I will fight among the foremost; but my honest neighbours well know I am not a trained soldier in the discipline of wars or the attack of strongholds."

"Since it stands thus with noble Cedric," said Locksley, "I am most willing to take on me the direction of the archery; and ye shall hang me up on my own trysting-tree an the defenders be permitted to show themselves over the walls without being stuck with as many shafts as there are cloves in a gammon of bacon at Christmas."

"Well said, stout yeoman," answered the Black Knight; "and if I be thought worthy to have a charge in these matters, and can find among these brave men as many as are willing to follow a true English knight, for so I may surely call myself, I am ready, with such skill as my experience has taught me, to lead them to the attack of these walls."

The parts being thus distributed to the leaders, they commenced the first assault, of which the reader has already heard the issue.

When the barbican was carried, the Sable Knight sent notice of the happy event to Locksley, requesting him at the same time to keep such a strict observation on the castle as might prevent the defenders from combining their force for a sudden sally, and recovering the outwork which they had lost. This the knight was chiefly desirous of avoiding, conscious that the men whom he led, being hasty and ned volunteers, imperfectly armed and unaccustomed discipline, must, upon any sudden attack, fight at great devantage with the veteran soldiers of the Norman knight, who were well provided with arms both defensive and offensive; and who, to match the zeal and high spirit of the besiegers, had all the confidence which arises from that discipline and the habitual use of weapons.
The knight employed the interval in causing to be con-ected a sort of floating bridge, or long raft, by means of which he hoped to cross the moat in despite of the resistance of the enemy. This was the work of some time, which leaders the less regretted, as it gave Ulrica leisure to execute her plan of diversion in their favour, whatever that might be.
When the raft was completed, the Black Knight advised the besiegers: “It avails not waiting here longer, friends; the sun is descending to the west, and I have not upon my hands which will not permit me to tarry with another day. Besides, it will be a marvel if the horsemen come not upon us from York, unless we speedily accomplish our purpose. Wherefore, one of ye go to Locks-ford, and bid him commence a discharge of arrows on the opposite side of the castle, and move forward as if about to surb it; and you, true English hearts, stand by me, and ready to thrust the raft endlong over the moat when the postern on our side is thrown open. Follow me dly across, and aid me to burst yon sallyport in the main doors of the castle. As many of you as like not this service, are but ill armed to meet it, do you man the top of the work, draw your bowstrings to your ears, and mind you all with your shot whatever shall appear to man the ramb-
t. Noble Cedric, wilt thou take the direction of those which remain?”
“Not so, by the soul of Hereward!” said the Saxon;
and I cannot; but may posterity curse me in my grave, if follow not with the foremost wherever thou shalt point.
the way. The quarrel is mine, and well it becomes me to be in the van of the battle."

"Yet, bethink thee, noble Saxon," said the knight, "thou hast neither hauberk, nor corselet, nor aught but that light helmet, target, and sword."

"The better!" answered Cedric; "I shall be the lighter to climb these walls. And—forgive the boast, Sir Knight—thou shalt this day see the naked breast of a Saxon as boldly presented to the battle as ever ye beheld the steel corselet of a Norman."

"In the name of God, then," said the knight, "fling open the door, and launch the floating bridge."

The portal, which led from the inner wall of the barbican to the moat, and which corresponded with a sallyport in the main wall of the castle, was now suddenly opened; the temporary bridge was then thrust forward, and soon flashed in the waters, extending its length between the castle and outwork, and forming a slippery and precarious passage for two men abreast to cross the moat. Well aware of the importance of taking the foe by surprise, the Black Knight, closely followed by Cedric, threw himself upon the bridge, and reached the opposite side. Here he began to thunder with his axe upon the gate of the castle, protected in part from the shot and stones cast by the defenders by the ruins of the former drawbridge, which the Templar had demolished in his retreat from the barbican, leaving the counterpoise still attached to the upper part of the portal. The followers of the knight had no such shelter; two were instantly shot with cross-bow bolts, and two more fell into the moat; the others retreated back into the barbican.

The situation of Cedric and of the Black Knight was now truly dangerous, and would have been still more so but for the constancy of the archers in the barbican, who ceased not to shower their arrows upon the battlements, distracting the attention of those by whom they were manned, and

* COUNTERPOISE. The counterweight used in raising the drawbridge.
ing a respite to their two chiefs from the storm of arrows which must otherwise have overwhelmed them. Their situation was eminently perilous, and was becoming so with every moment.

"Shame on ye all!" cried De Bracy to the soldiers; "do ye call yourselves cross-bowmen, and let two dogs keep their station under the walls of the tower? Heave over the coping stones from the battlement, better may not be. Get pickaxe and levers, and down that huge pinnacle!" pointing to a heavy piece of stone masonry that projected from the parapet.

At this moment the besiegers caught sight of the red and gold banner of the angle of the tower which Ulrica had described to Cedric. The stout yeoman Locksley was the first who saw it, as he was hastening to the outwork, impatient for the progress of the assault.

"St. George!" he cried—"Merry St. George for England!"

To the charge, bold yeomen! why leave ye the good and noble Cedric to storm the pass alone? Make the red priest, show thou canst fight for thy rosary—make brave yeomen!—the castle is ours, we have friends in. See yonder flag, it is the appointed signal—Torquemada is ours! Think of honour—think of spoil! One with that he bent his good bow, and sent a shaft right through the breast of one of the men-at-arms, who, under Cedric's direction, was loosening a fragment from one of the battlements to precipitate on the heads of Cedric and the Black Knight. A second soldier caught from the dying man the iron crow with which he had at and had loosened the stone pinnacle, when, reeling an arrow through his head-piece, he dropped from the battlements into the moat a dead man. The men-at-arms were daunted, for no armour seemed proof against the

ING STONES. The cap-stones, flat and heavy.
“Do you give ground, base knaves!” said De Bracy.

"Mount joye St. Denis!" Give me the lever!

And, snatching it up, he again assailed the loose pinnacle, which was of weight enough, if thrown down not only to have destroyed the remnant of the drawbridge which sheltered the two foremost assailants, but also to have sunk the rude float of planks over which they had crossed. All saw the danger, and the boldest, even the stout Locksley himself, avoided setting foot on the raft. Thrice did Locksley bend his shaft against De Bracy, and thrice did his arrow bound back from the knight’s armour of proof.

"Curse on thy Spanish steel-coat!” said Locksley. "English smith forged it, these arrows had gone through as if it had been silk or sendal.” He then began to call:

“Comrades! friends! noble Cedric! bear back and let ruin fall.”

His warning voice was unheard, for the din which knight himself occasioned by his strokes upon the post would have drowned twenty war-trumpets. The faith of Gurth indeed sprung forward on the planked bridge, toward Cedric of his impending fate, or to share it with him. His warning would have come too late; the massive pine already tottered, and De Bracy, who still heaved at his post, would have accomplished it, had not the voice of the Trumpeter sounded close in his ear:

“All is lost, De Bracy; the castle burns.”

“Thou art mad to say so!” replied the knight.

“It is all in a light flame on the western side. I have striven in vain to extinguish it.”

With the stern coolness which formed the basis of character, Brian de Bois-Guilbert communicated this hideous intelligence, which was not so calmly received by his astonished comrade.

“Saints of Paradise!” said De Bracy; “what is this?"

1 Mount Joye St. Denis. St. Denis, the patron saint of France, to have suffered martyrdom on the hill in Paris, called Mont-Joux.
"I vow to St. Nicholas of Limoges a candlestick of gold—"

"Spare thy vow," said the Templar, "and mark me. Thy men down, as if to a sally; throw the postern gate. There are but two men who occupy the float, fling into the moat, and push across for the barbican. I charge from the main gate, and attack the barbican on outside; and if we can regain that post, be assured we defend ourselves until we are relieved, or at least till grant us fair quarter."

"It is well thought upon," said De Bracy; "I will play art. Templar, thou wilt not fail me?"

Hand and glove, I will not!" said Bois-Guilbert. "But thee, in the name of God!"

De Bracy hastily drew his men together, and rushed to the postern gate, which he caused instantly to be open. But scarce was this done ere the portentous figure of the Black Knight forced his way inward in the middle of De Bracy and his followers. Two of the foremost fell, and the rest gave way notwithstanding all leader's efforts to stop them.

"Dogs!" said De Bracy, "will ye let two men win our pass for safety?"

"He is the devil!" said a veteran man-at-arms, bearing from the blows of their sable antagonist.

"And if he be the devil," replied De Bracy, "would you put him into the mouth of hell? The castle burns beneath, villains!—let despair give you courage, or let me! I will cope with this champion myself."

And well and chivalrous did De Bracy that day maintain the fame he had acquired in the civil wars of that fruitful period. The vaulted passage to which the postern entrance, and in which these two redoubted champions were now fighting hand to hand, rung with the furious which they dealt each other, De Bracy with his Black Knight with his ponderous axe.
length the Norman received a blow which, though its felloe was partly parried by his shield, for otherwise never would De Bracy have again moved limb, descended with such violence on his crest that he measured his length on the paved floor.

"Yield thee, De Bracy," said the Black Champion, standing over him, and holding against the bars of his helmet the fatal poniard with which the knights despatched their enemies, and which was called the dagger of mercy—"yield thee, Maurice de Bracy, rescue or no rescue, or thou art a dead man."

"I will not yield," replied De Bracy, faintly, "to an unknown conqueror. Tell me thy name, or work thy pleasure on me; it shall never be said that Maurice de Bracy yielded to a nameless churl."

The Black Knight whispered something into the ear of the vanquished.

"I yield me to be true prisoner, rescue or no rescue," answered the Norman, exchanging his tone of stern determination for one of deep though sullen submission.

"Go to the barbican," said the victor, in a tone of authority, "and there wait my further orders."

"Yet first let me say," said De Bracy, "what it importeth thee to know. Wilfred of Ivanhoe is wounded and a prisoner, and will perish in the burning castle without protection."

"Wilfred of Ivanhoe!" exclaimed the Black Knight. "Prisoner, and perish! The life of every man in the castle shall answer it if a hair of his head be singed. Show me the chamber!"

"Ascend yonder winding stair," said De Bracy; "it leads to his apartment. Wilt thou not accept my guidance? I added, in a submissive voice.

"No. To the barbican, and there wait my orders. Trust thee not, De Bracy."

"
uring this combat and the brief conversation which cedric, at the head of a body of men, among whom was conspicuous, had pushed across the bridge as
as they saw the postern open, and drove back the disand despairing followers of De Bracy, of whom some quarter, some offered vain resistance, and the greater led towards the courtyard. De Bracy himself arose the ground, and cast a sorrowful glance after his con-“He trusts me not!” he repeated; “but have I de-his trust?” He then lifted his sword from the floor, off his helmet in token of submission, and, going to the man, gave up his sword to Locksley, whom he met by

as the fire augmented, symptoms of it became soon ent in the chamber where Ivanhoe was watched and s by the Jewess Rebecca. He had been awakened his brief slumber by the noise of the battle; and his ant, who had, at his anxious desire, again placed her the window to watch and report to him the fate of the was for some time prevented from observing either increase of the smouldering and stifling vapour. At the volumes of smoke which rolled into the apart-the cries for water, which were heard even above the
the battle, made them sensible of the progress of this danger.

The castle burns,” said Rebecca—“it burns! What we do to save ourselves?”

“Fly, Rebecca, and save thine own life,” said Ivanhoe, no human aid can avail me.”

will not fly,” answered Rebecca; “we will be saved or gether. And yet, great God! my father—my
, what will be his fate?”

At this moment the door of the apartment flew open.

e Templar presented himself—a ghastly figure, for ned armour was broken and bloody, and the plum was partly shorn away, partly burnt from his casque. "Have found thee," said he to Rebecca; "thou shalt not keep my word to share weal and woe with thee. There is but one path to safety: I have cut my way through dangers to point it to thee; up, and instantly follow me!"

"Alone," answered Rebecca, "I will not follow thee. Thou wert born of woman—if thou hast but a touch of human charity in thee—if thy heart be not hard as a breastplate—save my aged father—save this woe and woeless knight!"

"A knight," answered the Templar, with his characteristic calmness—"a knight, Rebecca, must encounter fate, whether it meet him in the shape of sword or flame, and who recks how or where a Jew meets with his?"

"Savage warrior," said Rebecca, "rather will I perish the flames than accept safety from thee!"

"Thou shalt not choose, Rebecca; once didst thou own me, but never mortal did so twice."

So saying, he seized on the terrified maiden, who flew in the air with her shrieks, and bore her out of the room in arms, in spite of her cries, and without regarding the enmities and defiance which Ivanhoe thundered against—

"Hound of the Temple—stain to thine order—set free the damsel! Traitor of Bois-Guilbert, it is Ivanhoe who commends thee! Villain, I will have thy heart's blood!"

"I had not found thee, Wilfred," said the Black Knight who at that instant entered the apartment, "but for you, shouts."

"If thou be'st true knight," said Wilfred, "think not of me—pursue yon ravisher—save the Lady Rowena—look to the noble Cedric!"

1 Follow Me. The author has some idea that this passage is from the appearance of Phidias at the divine Mandane, when city of Babylon is on fire and he proposes to carry her from the flames. The theft, if there be one, would be rather too severely punished by the instance of searching for the original passage through the interminable rolls of the Grand Cyrus. [Scott.]
“In their turn,” answered he of the Fetterlock, “but one is first.”

And seizing upon Ivanhoe, he bore him off with as much diligence as the Templar had carried off Rebecca, rushed with him to the postern, and having there delivered his burden to the care of two yeomen, he again entered the castle to assist in the rescue of the other prisoners.

One turret was now in bright flames, which flashed out violently from window and shot-hole. But in other parts the great thickness of the walls and the vaulted roofs of the dungeons resisted the progress of the flames, and there the rage of man still triumphed, as the scarce more dreadful terror held mastery elsewhere; for the besiegers pursued the defenders of the castle from chamber to chamber, and inflicted in their blood the vengeance which had long animated them against the soldiers of the tyrant Front-deboeuf. Most of the garrison resisted to the uttermost; few of them asked quarter; none received it. The air was filled with groans and clashing of arms; the floors were slippery with the blood of despairing and expiring wretches.

Through this scene of confusion, Cedric rushed in quest of Rowena, while the faithful Gurth, following him closely through the mêlée, neglected his own safety while he strove to avert the blows that were aimed at his master. The faithful Saxon was so fortunate as to reach his ward’s apartment just as she had abandoned all hope of safety, and, with a crucifix clasped in agony to her bosom, sat in expectation of instant death. He committed her to the charge of Gurth, who conducted in safety to the barbican, the road to which was now cleared of the enemy, and not yet interrupted by the flames. This accomplished, the loyal Cedric hastened in quest of his friend Athelstane, determined, at every risk to himself, to save that last scion of Saxon royalty. But Cedric penetrated as far as the old hall in which he had himself been a prisoner, the inventive genius of Wamba had procured liberation for himself and his companion in adversity.

When the noise of the conflict announced that it was the hottest, the Jester began to shout, with the utmost power of his lungs, "St. George and the dragon! Bonnie George for merry England! The castle is won!" As these sounds he rendered yet more fearful by hurling against each other two or three pieces of rusty armour which lay scattered around the hall.

A guard, which had been stationed in the outer or ante-room, and whose spirits were already in a state of abject terror, took fright at Wamba's clamour, and, leaving the door of the hall behind them, ran to tell the Templar that foesmen had entered the old hall. Meantime the prisoners found no difficulty in making their escape into the ante-room, and thence into the court of the castle, which was now the scene of contest. Here sat the fierce Templar, mounted on horseback, surrounded by several of the garrison both on horse and foot, who had united their strength to that of the renowned leader, in order to secure the last chance of safety and retreat which remained to them. The drawbridge had been lowered by his orders, but the passage was beset by the archers, who had hitherto only annoyed the castle from that side by their missiles, no sooner saw the flames break out, and the bridge lowered, than they thronged to the entrance, as well to prevent the escape of the garrison as to secure their own share of booty ere the castle should be burnt down. On the other hand, a party of the besiegers, who had entered by the postern, were now issuing out of the courtyard, and attacking with fury the remnant of the defenders, who were thus assaulted on both sides at once.

Animated, however, by despair, and supported by the ample of their indomitable leader, the remaining soldiers of the castle fought with the utmost valour; and, being armed, succeeded more than once in driving back the assailants, though much inferior in numbers.
aced on horseback before one of the Templar's Saracen aves, was in the midst of the little party; and Bois-Guil art, notwithstanding the confusion of the bloody fray, owed every attention to her safety. Repeatedly he was her side, and, neglecting his own defence, held before her ence of his triangular steel-plated shield; and anon uting from his position by her, he cried his war-cry, shed forward, struck to earth the most forward of the allants, and was on the same instant once more at her le rein.

Athelstane, who, as the reader knows, was slothful, but cowardly, beheld the female form whom the Templar ected thus sedulously, and doubted not that it was wena whom the knight was carrying off, in despite of all istance which could be offered.

"By the soul of St. Edward," he said, "I will rescue her yonder over-proud knight, and he shall die by my nd!"

"Think what you do!" cried Wamba; "hasty hand ches frog for fish; by my bauble, yonder is none of my y Rowena, see but her long dark locks! Nay, an ye will t know black from white, ye may be leader, but I will be ollower; no bones of mine shall be broken unless I know whom. And you without armour too! Bethink you, bonnet never kept out steel blade. Nay, then, if wilful
t to water, wilful must drench.2 Deus vobiscum, most ughty Athelstane!" he concluded, loosening the hold ich he had hitherto kept upon the Saxon's tunic.

To snatch a mace from the pavement, on which it lay ide one whose dying grasp had just relinquished it, to on the Templar's band, and to strike in quick succesn to the right and left, levelling a warrior at each blow,
, for Athelstane's great strength, now animated with usual fury, but the work of a single moment; he was soon.
within two yards of Bois-Guilbert, whom he defied in his loudest tone.

"Turn, false-hearted Templar! let go her whom thou art unworthy to touch; turn, limb of a band of murdering and hypocritical robbers!"

"Dog!" said the Templar, grinding his teeth, "I will teach thee to blaspheme the holy order of the Temple of Zion"; and with these words, half-wheeling his steed, he made a demi-courbette\(^1\) towards the Saxon, and rising in the stirrups, so as to take full advantage of the descent of the horse, he discharged a fearful blow upon the head of Athelstane.

Well said Wamba, that silken bonnet keeps out no steel blade! So trenchant was the Templar's weapon, that it sheer asunder, as it had been a willow twig, the tough and plaited handle of the mace, which the ill-fated Saxon revered to parry the blow, and, descending on his head, levelled him with the earth.

"Ha! Beau-seant!" exclaimed Bois-Guilbert, "thus be it to the malignors of the Temple knights!" Taking advantage of the dismay which was spread by the fall of Athelstane, and calling aloud, "Those who would save themselves, follow me!" he pushed across the drawbridge, dispersing the archers who would have intercepted them. He was followed by his Saracens, and some five or six men-at-arms who had mounted their horses. The Templar's retreat was rendered perilous by the numbers of arrows shot off at him and his party; but this did not prevent him from galloping round to the barbican, of which, according to his previous plan, he supposed it possible De Bracy might have been in possession.

"De Bracy! De Bracy!" he shouted, "art thou there?"

"I am here," replied De Bracy, "but I am a prisoner."

"Can I rescue thee?" cried Bois-Guilbert.

"No," replied De Bracy; "I have rendered me, rescuer!"

\(^1\) DEMI-COURBETTE. He caused the horse to rear.
to rescue. I will be true prisoner. Save thyself; there are hawks abroad. Put the seas betwixt you and England; I am not say more."

"Well," answered the Templar, "an thou wilt tarry here, remember I have redeemed word and glove. Be the hawks where they will, methinks the walls of the preceptory of Templestowe will be cover sufficient, and thither will like heron to her haunt."

Having thus spoken, he galloped off with his followers. Those of the castle who had not gotten to horse still continued to fight desperately with the besiegers, after the departure of the Templar, but rather in despair of quarter than that they entertained any hope of escape. The fire was spreading rapidly through all parts of the castle, when Tricia, who had first kindled it, appeared on a turret, in the guise of one of the ancient furies, yelling forth a war-song, such as was of yore raised on the field of battle by the scalds of the yet heathen Saxons. Her long dishevelled grey hair flew back from her uncovered head; the inebriating delight of gratified vengeance contended in her eyes with the fire of insanity; and she brandished the distaff which she held in her hand, as if she had been one of the Fatal Sisters who spin and abridge the thread of human life. Tradition has reserved some wild strophes of the barbarous hymn which she chanted wildly amid that scene of fire and of slaughter:

\[ \text{Thet the bright steel,} \\
\text{Thet the steel glimmers not for the carving of the banquet} \\
\text{Thet the steel, the raven croaks!} \\
\text{Thet the torch, Zernebock is yelling!} \\
\text{Thet the steel, sons of the Dragon!} \\
\text{Thet the torch, daughter of Hengist!} \]

1 Scaldr. The Scandinavian word for poet.
2 Fatal Sisters. For a description of the Three Fates, see a manual of mythology.
The black cloud is low over the thane's castle;
The eagle screams—he rides on its bosom.
Scream not, grey rider of the sable cloud,
Thy banquet is prepared!
The maidens of Valhalla look forth,
The race of Hengist will send them guests,
Shake your black tresses, maidens of Valhalla!
And strike your loud timbrels for joy!
Many a haughty step bends to your halls,
Many a helmed head.
Dark sits the evening upon the thane's castle,
The black clouds gather round;
Soon shall they be red as the blood of the valiant!
The destroyer of forests shall shake his red crest against them.
He, the bright consumer of palaces,
Bred waves he his blazing banner:
Red, wide, and dusky,
Over the strife of the valiant:
His joy is in the clashing swords and broken bucklers;
He loves to lick the hissing blood as it bursts warm from wound!

All must perish!
The sword cleaveth the helmet;
The strong armour is pierced by the lance;
Fire devoureth the dwelling of princes;
Engines break down the fences of the battle.
All must perish!
The race of Hengist is gone—
The name of Horsa is no more!
Shrink not then from your doom, sons of the sword!
Let your blades drink blood like wine;
Feast ye in the banquet of slaughter,
By the light of the blazing halls!
Strong be your swords while your blood is warm,
And spare neither for pity nor fear,
For vengeance hath but an hour;
Strong hate itself shall expire!
I also must perish!\(^{1}\)

\(^{1}\) ULRIC\'S HYMN. It will readily occur to the antiquary that these are intended to imitate the antique poetry of the Scalds—the minstrels of old Scandinavians—the race, as the Laureate so happily terms them.

"Stern to inflict, and stubborn to endure,
Who smiled in death."

The poetry of the Anglo-Saxons, after their civilization and conversion, of a different and softer character: but in the circumstances of times, may be not unnaturally supposed to return to the wild strains which more her forefathers during the time of Paganism and untamed ferocity. See note, page 94.
The towering flames had now surmounted every obstruction, and rose to the evening skies one huge and burning con, seen far and wide through the adjacent country. Tower after tower crashed down, with blazing roof and floor; and the combatants were driven from the courtyard. The vanquished, of whom very few remained, scattered and sped into the neighbouring wood. The victors, assembling in large bands, gazed with wonder, not unmixed with fear, upon the flames, in which their own ranks and arms seemed dusky red. The maniac figure of the Saxon Ulrica, for a long time visible on the lofty stand she had chosen, 'dimmed her arms abroad with wild exultation, as if she should be empress of the conflagration which she had raised. Length, with a terrific crash, the whole turret gave way, and she perished in the flames which had consumed her. An awful pause of horror silenced each murmur of the armed spectators, who, for the space of several minutes, red not a finger, save to sign the cross. The voice of Aksley was then heard: "Shout, yeomen! the den of villains is no more! Let each bring his spoil to our chosen rendezvous at the trysting-tree in the Harthill wood; for there at break of day will we make just partition among our own bands, together with our worthy allies in great deed of vengeance."
CHAPTER XXXII

Trust me, each state must have its policies;
Kingdoms have edicts, cities have their charters;
Even the wild outlaw, in his forest-walk,
Keeps yet some touch of civil discipline;
For not since Adam wore his verdant apron,
Hath man with man in social union dwelt,
But laws were made to draw that union closer.

Old Play.

The daylight had dawned upon the glades of the old forest. The green boughs glittered with all their pearls of dew. The hind led her fawn from the covert of high forest, to the more open walks of the greenwood, and no hunter was there to watch or intercept the stately hart, as he paced at the head of the antlered herd.

The outlaws were all assembled around the trysting-place in the Harthill Walk, where they had spent the night refreshing themselves after the fatigues of the siege—some with wine, some with slumber, many with hearing and recounting the events of the day, and computing the heaps of plunder which their success had placed at the disposal of their chief.

The spoils were indeed very large; for, notwithstanding that much was consumed, a great deal of plate, rich armor, and splendid clothing had been secured by the exertions of the dauntless outlaws, who could be appalled by no danger when such rewards were in view. Yet so strict were the laws of their society, that no one ventured to appropriate any part of the booty, which was brought into one common mass, to be at the disposal of their leader.

The place of rendezvous was an aged oak; not, however, the same to which Locksley had conducted Gurth and Wain... in the earlier part of the story, but one which was the re of a silvan amphitheatre, within half a mile of the olished castle of Torquilstone. Here Locksley assumed seat—a throne of turf erected under the twisted ches of the huge oak, and the silvan followers were ered around him. He assigned to the Black Knight a at his right hand, and to Cedric a place upon his left.
“Pardon my freedom, noble sirs,” he said, “but in these es I am monarch: they are my kingdom; and these my subjects would reck but little of my power, were I,
in my own dominions, to yield place to mortal man.
y, sirs, who hath seen our chaplain? where is our curtal
? A mass amongst Christian men best begins a busy ning.” No one had seen the clerk of Copmanhurst.
er God’s forbode!” said the outlaw chief, “I trust the est priest hath but abidden by the wine-pot a thought too
Who saw him since the castle was ta’en?”
“T,” quoth the Miller, “marked him busy about the door ellar, swearing by each saint in the calendar he would the smack of Front-de-Bœuf’s Gascoigne wine.” “Now, the saints, as many as there be of them,” said the ain, “forefend, lest he has drunk too deep of the wines, and perished by the fall of the castle! Away, Miller!
with you enow of men, seek the place where you last him, throw water from the moat on the scorching ruins;
I have them removed stone by stone ere I lose my curtal
r.”
The numbers who hastened to execute this duty, consid-g that an interesting division of spoil was about to take ed, showed how much the troop had at heart the safety hier spiritual father.
“Meanwhile, let us proceed,” said Locksley; “for when bold deed shall be sounded abroad, the bands of De ty, of Malvoisin, and other allies of Front-de-Bœuf, will \textit{D Tal.} Tonsured, docked. The term here used may possibly indicate he Priest had shortened the skirts of his gown.

A tear stood in the eye of the rough thane as he spoke—ark of feeling which even the death of Athelstane had extracted; but there was something in the half-instincattachment of his clown that waked his nature more only than even grief itself.

“Nay,” said the Jester, extricating himself from his master’s caress, “if you pay my service with the water of my eye, the Jester must weep for company, and then what comes of his vocation? But, uncle, if you would indeed persuade me, I pray you to pardon my playfellow Gurth, who in a week from your service to bestow it on your son.”

“Pardon him!” exclaimed Cedric; “I will both pardon reward him. Kneel down, Gurth.” The swineherd in an instant at his master’s feet. “Theow and Esne thou no longer,” said Cedric, touching him with a wand; Folkfree and Sacleth art thou in town and from town, he forest as in the field. A hide of land I give to thee in steads of Walbrugham, from me and mine to thee and me aye and for ever; and God’s malison on his head who again saith!”

No longer a serf but a freeman and a landholder, Gurth hung upon his feet, and twice bounded aloft to almost his height from the ground.

“A smith and a file,” he cried, “to do away the collar in the neck of a freeman! Noble master! doubled is my strength by your gift, and doubly will I fight for you! There free spirit in my breast. I am a man changed to myself all round. Ha, Fangs!” he continued, for that faith-cur, seeing his master thus transported, began to jump on him to express his sympathy, “knowest thou thy mas-still?”

“Ay,” said Wamba, “Fangs and I still know thee, Gurth, Theow and Esne. Thrall and bondsman.

Folkfree and Sacleth. A lawful freeman. [Scott]
Hide. About 100 acres, or as much as could be tilled with one plow.
Malison. A curse; compare benison.
though we must needs abide by the collar; it is only likely to forget both us and thyself.”

“I shall forget myself indeed ere I forget thee, true rade,” said Gurth; “and were freedom fit for thee, We the master would not let thee want it.”

“Nay,” said Wamba, “never think I envy thee, br Gurth; the serf sits by the hall fire when the freeman forth to the field of battle. And what saith Alden, Malmsbury—‘Better a fool at a feast than a wise man fray.’”

The tramp of horses was now heard, and the Lady enae appeared, surrounded by several riders, and a stronger party of footmen, who joyfully shook their and clashed their brown-bills for joy of her freedom.
herself, richly attired, and mounted on a dark chestnut rey, had recovered all the dignity of her manner, and an unwonted degree of paleness showed the suffering had undergone. Her lovely brow, though sorrowful, on it a cast of reviving hope for the future, as well grateful thankfulness for the past deliverance. She that Ivanhoe was safe, and she knew that Athelstan dead. The former assurance filled her with the most cere delight; and if she did not absolutely rejoice in latter, she might be pardoned for feeling the full adva of being freed from further persecution on the only st
in which she had ever been contradicted by her gu Cedric.

As Rowena bent her steed towards Locksley’s seat bold yeoman, with all his followers, rose to receive her by a general instinct of courtesy. The blood rose to cheeks as, courteously waving her hand, and bende that her beautiful and loose tresses were for an it mixed with the flowing mane of her palfrey, she exp
in few but apt words her obligations and her grati Locksley and her other deliverers. “God bless ye.
"she concluded—"God and Our Lady bless you and reward you for gallantly perilling yourselves in the cause of the oppressed! If any of you should hunger, remember Rowena has food; if you should thirst, she has many a butt and brown ale; and if the Normans drive ye from ye walks, Rowena has forests of her own, where her gallant deliverers may range at full freedom, and never ranger whose arrow hath struck down the deer."

"Thanks, gentle lady," said Locksley—"thanks from my company and myself. But to have saved you requites itself. For it is said, who walk the greenwood do many a wild deed, and the squire of Rowena's deliverance may be received as an atone—"

Again bowing from her palfrey, Rowena turned to depart; but pausing a moment, while Cedric, who was to attend her, was also taking his leave, she found herself unexpectedly close by the prisoner De Bracy. He stood near a tree in deep meditation, his arms crossed upon his breast, and Rowena was in hopes she might pass him unnoticed. He looked up, however, and, when aware of her presence, a deep flush of shame suffused his handsome features. He stood a moment most irresolute; then, springing forward, took her palfrey by the rein and bent his head before her.

"Will the Lady Rowena deign to cast an eye on a captive knight—on a dishonoured soldier?"

"Sir Knight," answered Rowena, "in enterprises such as ours, the real dishonour lies not in failure, but in success."

"Conquest, lady, should soften the heart," answered De Bracy; "let me but know that the Lady Rowena forgives the violence occasioned by an ill-fated passion, and she shall learn that De Bracy knows how to serve her in nobler ways."

"I forgive you, Sir Knight," said Rowena, "as a Chris—"
“That means,” said Wamba, “that she does not forgive him at all.”

“But I can never forgive the misery and desolation your madness has occasioned,” continued Rowena.

“Unloose your hold on the lady’s rein,” said Cedric, coming up. “By the bright sun above us, but it were shame, I would pin thee to the earth with my javelin; but be well assured, thou shalt smart, Maurice de Bracy, for thy share in this foul deed.”

“He threatens safely who threatens a prisoner,” said De Bracy; “but when had a Saxon any touch of courtesy?”

Then retiring two steps backward, he permitted the lady to move on.

Cedric, ere they departed, expressed his peculiar gratitude to the Black Champion, and earnestly entreated him to accompany him to Rotherwood.

“I know,” he said, “that ye errant knights desire to carry your fortunes on the point of your lance, and reckon not of land or goods; but war is a changeful mistress, and a home is sometimes desirable even to the champion whose trade is wandering. Thou hast earned one in the halls of Rotherwood, noble knight. Cedric has wealth enough to repair the injuries of fortune, and all he has is his deliverer’s. Come, therefore, to Rotherwood, not as a guest but as a son or brother.”

“Cedric has already made me rich,” said the Knight; “he has taught me the value of Saxon virtue. To Rotherwood will I come, brave Saxon, and that speedily; but, as now pressing matters of moment detain me from your halls, Peradventure, when I come hither, I will ask such a boon as will put even thy generosity to the test.”

“It is granted ere spoken out,” said Cedric, striking his ready hand into the gauntleted palm of the Black Knight—“it is granted already, were it to affect half my fortune.”

“Gage not thy promise so lightly,” said the Knight of the Fetterlock; "yet well I hope to gain the boon I shall ask. Meanwhile, adieu."

"I have but to say," added the Saxon, "that, during the funeral rites of the noble Athelstane, I shall be an inhabitant of the halls of his castle of Coningsburgh. They will open to all who choose to partake of the funeral banquet; and—I speak in name of the noble Edith, mother of the fallen prince—they will never be shut against him who poured so bravely, though unsuccessfully, to save Athelriere from Norman chains and Norman steel."

"Ay, ay," said Wamba, who had resumed his attendance of his master, "rare feeding there will be; pity that the noble Athelstane cannot banquet at his own funeral. But," continued the Jester, lifting up his eyes gravely, "is leaping in Paradise, and doubtless does honour to the deer."

"Peace, and move on," said Cedric, his anger at this undue jest being checked by the recollection of Wamba's recent services. Rowena waved a graceful adieu to him of the Fetterlock, the Saxon bade God speed him, and on they moved through a wide glade of the forest.

They had scarce departed, ere a sudden procession moved from under the greenwood branches, swept slowly and the silvan amphitheatre, and took the same direction with Rowena and her followers. The priests of a neighbouring convent, in expectation of the ample donation, or "soul-scat," 1 which Cedric had propined, 2 attended upon the car, which the body of Athelstane was laid, and sang hymns it was sadly and slowly borne on the shoulders of his vassals to his castle of Coningsburgh, to be there deposited in a grave of Hengist, from whom the deceased derived his noble descent. Many of his vassals had assembled at the news of his death, and followed the bier with all the external marks, at least, of dejection and sorrow. Again the outlaws

1 soul-scat. See note, page 180.
2 propined. Promised.
arose, and paid the same rude and spontaneous homage to death which they had so lately rendered to beauty: the slow chant and mournful step of the priests brought back to their remembrance such of their comrades as had fallen in the yesterday's affray. But such recollections dwell not long with those who lead a life of danger and enterprise, and till the sound of the death-hymn had died on the wind, the outlaws were again busied in the distribution of their spoil.

"Valiant knight," said Locksley to the Black Champion,
"without whose good heart and mighty arm our enterprise must altogether have failed, will it please you to take from that mass of spoil whatever may best serve to please you, and to remind you of this my trysting-tree?"

"I accept the offer," said the Knight, "as frankly as if it is given; and I ask permission to dispose of Sir Maurice de Bracy at my own pleasure."

"He is thine already," said Locksley, "and well for him;
else the tyrant had graced the highest bough of this oak,
with as many of his Free Companions as we could gather hanging thick as acorns around him. But he is thy prisoner, and he is safe, though he had slain my father."

"De Bracy," said the Knight, "thou art free—deport
He whose prisoner thou art scorns to take mean revenge for what is past. But beware of the future, lest a worse thing befall thee. Maurice de Bracy, I say beware!"

De Bracy bowed low and in silence, and was about to withdraw, when the yeomen burst at once into a shout of execration and derision. The proud knight instantly stopped, turned back, folded his arms, drew up his form to its full height, and exclaimed, "Peace, ye yelping curs! who open upon a cry which ye followed not when the stag was at bay. De Bracy scorns your censure as he would disdain your applause. To your brakes and caves, ye outlawed thieves! and be silent when aught knightly or noble is but spoken within a league of your fox-earths—"
This ill-timed defiance might have procured for De Tracy a volley of arrows, but for the hasty and imperative interference of the outlaw chief. Meanwhile, the knight caught a horse by the rein, for several which had been taken in the stables of Front-de-Bœuf stood accoutred around, and were a valuable part of the booty. He threw himself upon the saddle, and galloped off through the wood.

When the bustle occasioned by this incident was somewhat composed, the chief outlaw took from his neck the rich horn and baldric which he had recently gained at the strife of archery near Ashby.

"Noble knight," he said to him of the Fetterlock, "if you disdain not to grace by your acceptance a bugle which English yeoman has once worn, this I will pray you to keep as a memorial of your gallant bearing; and if ye have aught to do, and, as happeneth oft to a gallant knight, ye chance to be hard bested in any forest between Trent and Tees, wind three motts upon the horn thus, Wa-sa-hoa! and ye may well chance ye shall find helpers and rescue."

He then gave breath to the bugle, and winded once and again the call which he described, until the Knight had caught the notes.

"Gramercy for the gift, bold yeoman," said the Knight; and better help than thine and thy rangers would I never seek, were it at my utmost need." And then in his turn he ended the call till all the greenwood rang.

"Well blown and clearly," said the yeoman; "beshrew thee an thou knowest not as much of woodcraft as of war! thou hast been a striker of deer in thy day, I warrant. Comrades, mark these three motts, it is the call of the Knight of the Fetterlock; and he who hears it, and hastens not to serve him at his need, I will have him scourged out of our land with his own bowstring."

"Long live our leader!" shouted the yeomen, "and long..." live the Black Knight of the Fetterlock! May he soon use our service to prove how readily it will be paid."

Locksley now proceeded to the distribution of the spoil, which he performed with the most laudable impartiality. A tenth part of the whole was set apart for the church and for pious uses; a portion was next allotted to a sort of public treasury; a part was assigned to the widows and children of those who had fallen, or to be expended in masses for the souls of such as had left no surviving family. The rest was divided amongst the outlaws, according to their rank and merit; and the judgment of the chief, on all such doubtful questions as occurred, was delivered with great shrewdness and received with absolute submission. The Black Knight was not a little surprised to find that men in a state so lawless were nevertheless among themselves so regularly and equitably governed, and all that he observed added to his opinion of the justice and judgment of their leader.

When each had taken his own proportion of the body, and while the treasurer, accompanied by four tall yeomen, was transporting that belonging to the state to some place of concealment or of security, the portion devoted to the church still remained unappropriated.

"I would," said the leader, "we could hear tidings of our joyous chaplain; he was never wont to be absent when most was to be blessed, or spoil to be parted; and it is his duty to take care of these the tithes of our successful enterprise. It may be the office has helped to cover some of his canonical irregularities. Also, I have a holy brother of his a prisoner at no great distance, and I would fain have the Friar to help me to deal with him in due sort. I greatly misdoubt the safety of the bluff priest."

"I were right sorry for that," said the Knight of the Fetterlock, "for I stand indebted to him for the joyous hospitality of a merry night in his cell. Let us to the ruins of the castle; it may be we shall there learn some tidings of him."
While they thus spoke, a loud shout among the yeomen announced the arrival of him for whom they feared, as they learned from the stentorian voice of the Friar himself, long before they saw his burly person.

"Make room, my merry men!" he exclaimed—"room for our godly father and his prisoner. Cry welcome once more. I come, noble leader, like an eagle with my prey in my clutch." And making his way through the ring, amidst the laughter of all around, he appeared in majestic triumph, a huge partizan in one hand, and in the other a halter, one end of which was fastened to the neck of the unfortunate lad of York, who, bent down by sorrow and terror, was dragged on by the victorious priest, who shouted aloud, "There is Allan-a-Dale, to chronicle me in a ballad, or if it were but a lay? By St. Hermangild, the jingling crowder never out of the way where there is an apt theme for exalting valour!"

"Curtal priest," said the captain, "thou hast been at mass this morning, as early as it is. In the name of St. Nicholas, whom hast thou got here?"

"A captive to my sword and to my lance, noble captain," replied the Clerk of Copmanhurst—"to my bow and to my larch, I should rather say; and yet I have redeemed him from my divinity from a worse captivity. Speak, Jew—have I not ransomed thee from Sathanas?—have I not taught thee thy credo, thy pater, and thine Ave Maria? Did I not spend the whole night in drinking to thee, and in expounding of mysteries?"

"For the love of God!" ejaculated the poor Jew, "will no one take me out of the keeping of this mad—I mean this evil man?"

"How's this, Jew?" said the Friar, with a menacing aspect; "dost thou recant, Jew? Bethink thee, if thou dost lapse into thine infidelity, though thou art not so tender a suckling pig—I would I had one to break my fast upon —thou art not too tough to be roasted! Be comforted, Isaac, and repeat the words after me. Ave Maria!

"Nay, we will have no profanation, mad priest, Locksley; "let us rather hear where you found this pair of thine."

"By St. Dunstan!" said the Friar, "I found him wist as a change for better ware! I did step into the cellarage, and what might be rescued there; for though a cup of wine, with spice, be an evening's draught for an emperor, it was waste, methought, to let so much good liquor but at once; and I had caught up one runlet of sack, and coming to call more aid among these lazy knaves, wherever to seek when a good deed is to be done, when avised of a strong door. 'Aha!' thought I, 'here the choicest juice of all in this secret crypt; and the knave, being disturbed in his vocation, hath left the key door.' In therefore I went, and found just nought, a commodity of rusted chains and this dog of a Jew presently rendered himself my prisoner, rescue or not. I did but refresh myself after the fatigue of the action, the unbeliever with one humimg cup of sack, and wending to lead forth my captive, when, crash after crash, with wild thunder-dint and levin-fire, down topples the masonry of another tower—marry beshrew their hand built it not the firmer!—and blocked up the passage with the roar of one falling tower followed another. I gave thought of life; and deeming it a dishonour to one profession to pass out of this world in company with an unbeliever with my halberd to beat his brains out; but pity on his grey hairs, and judged it better to lay down my partizan, and take up my spiritual weapon for his conversion. And truly, by the blessing of St. Dunstan, he has been sown in good soil; only that, with speaking of mysteries through the whole night, and being in an ever-fasting—for the few draughts of sack which I shared

---

1 Levin-Fire. Flash of lightning.
with were not worth marking—my head is well-zied, I trow. But I was clean exhausted. Gilbert obald know in what state they found me—quite and hausted."
I can bear witness,” said Gilbert; “for when we had away the ruin, and by St. Dunstan’s help lighted the dungeon stair, we found the runlet of sack half-the Jew half-dead, and the Friar more than half—ed, as he calls it.”
be knaves! ye lie!” retorted the offended Friar; “it and your gormandising companions that drank up x, and called it your morning draught. I am a man I kept it not for the captain’s own throat. But cks it? The Jew is converted, and understands all told him, very nearly, if not altogether, as well as v,” said the captain, “is this true? Hast thou reltine unbelief?”
y I so find mercy in your eyes,” said the Jew, “as I not one word which the reverend prelate spake to me earful night. Alas! I was so distraught with agony,
, and grief, that had our holy father Abraham come to me, he had found but a deaf listener.”
ou liest, Jew, and thou knowest thou dost,” said the
I will remind thee but of one word of our confer-ou didst promise to give all thy substance to our ler.”
help me the promise, fair sirs,” said Isaac, even more than before, “as no such sounds ever crossed my Alas! I am an aged beggar’d man—I fear me a child-ve ruth on me, and let me go!”
y,” said the Friar, “if thou dost retract vows made or of holy church, thou must do penance.” ordingly, he raised his halberd, and would have laid of it lustily on the Jew’s shoulders, had not the Black Knight stopped the blow, and thereby transferred the holy clerk's resentment to himself.

"By St. Thomas of Kent," said he, "an I buckle to my gear,¹ I will teach thee, sir lazy lover, to mell² with thine own matters, maugre thine iron case there!"

"Nay, be not wroth with me," said the Knight; "thou knowest I am thy sworn friend and comrade."

"I know no such thing," answered the Friar; "and defy thee for a meddling coxcomb!"

"Nay, but," said the Knight, who seemed to take a pleasure in provoking his quondam host, "hast thou forgotten how, that for my sake—for I say nothing of the temptation of the flagon and the pasty—thou didst break thy vow of fast and vigil?"

"Truly, friend," said the Friar, clenching his huge fist, "I will bestow a buffet on thee."

"I accept of no such presents," said the Knight; "I am content to take thy cuff³ as a loan, but I will repay thee with usury as deep as ever thy prisoner there exacted in his traffic."

"I will prove that presently," said the Friar.

"Hola!" cried the captain, "what art thou after, meddle Friar—brawling beneath our trysting-tree?"

"No brawling," said the Knight; "it is but a friendly interchange of courtesy. Friar, strike an thou darest; I will stand thy blow, if thou wilt stand mine."

"Thou hast the advantage with that iron pot on the head," said the churchman; "but have at thee. Down the

¹ GEAR. Here, weapons.
² MELL. Meddle.
³ CUFF. The interchange of a cuff with the jolly priest is not entirely out of character with Richard I. If romances read him aright. In the very earliest romance on the subject of his adventures in the Holy Land, and his return from thence, it is recorded how he exchanged a pugilistic favor of nature, while a prisoner in Germany. His opponent was the son of the principal warden, and was so imprudent as to give the challenge to this latter buffets. The King stood forth like a true man, and received a blow which staggered him. In requital, having previously waxed his hand, a prime unknown. I believe, to the gentlemen of the modern fancy, he returns to box on the ear with such interest as to kill his antagonist on the spot. In Ells's Specimens of English Romance, that of Coeur-de-Lion. (1314.)

test, an thou wert Goliath of Gath in his brazen helmet.”

The Friar bared his brawny arm up to the elbow, and setting his full strength to the blow, gave the Knight a frett that might have felled an ox. But his adversary was firm as a rock. A loud shout was uttered by all the men around; for the clerk’s cuff was proverbial amongst them, and there were few who, in jest or earnest, had not d opportunity to know its vigour. “Now, priest,” said the Knight, pulling off his gauntlet, “if I had vantage on my ad, I will have none on my hand; stand fast as a true man.”

“Genam meam dedi vapulatori—1 I have given my cheek the smiter,” said the priest; “an thou canst stir me from a spot, fellow, I will freely bestow on thee the Jew’s ran-num.”

So spoke the burly priest, assuming, on his part, high fiance. But who may resist his fate? The buffet of the night was given with such strength and good-will that the Friar rolled head over heels upon the plain, to the great amazement of all the spectators. But he arose neither ugly nor crestfallen.

“Brother,” said he to the Knight, “thou shouldst have used thy strength with more discretion. I had mumbled at a lame mass an thou hadst broken my jaw, for the piper ays ill that wants the nether chops. Nevertheless, there my hand, in friendly witness that I will exchange no more iffs with thee, having been a loser by the barter. End now unkindness. Let us put the Jew on ransom, since the spald will not change his spots, and a Jew he will continue be.”

“The priest,” said Clement,2 “is not half so confident of the Jew’s conversion since he received that buffet on the y—”

“Go to, knave, what pratest thou of conversions? What,

1 Genam meam, etc. See Lamentations III. 30.

2 Clement. Does the author mean Gilbert? Clement was the name of de-Boys’s fellow.
is there no respect?—all masters and no men? I tell thee, fellow, I was somewhat totty\(^1\) when I received the good knight's blow, or I had kept my ground under it. But an thou gibest more of it, thou shalt learn I can give as well as take."

"Peace all!" said the captain. "And thou, Jew, think of thy ransom; thou needest not to be told that thy race are held to be accursed in all Christian communities, and trust me that we cannot endure thy presence among us. Think, therefore, of an offer, while I examine a prisoner of another cast."

"Were many of Front-de-Bœuf's men taken?" demanded the Black Knight.

"None of note enough to be put to ransom," answered the captain; "a set of hilding fellows there were, whom we dismissed to find them a new master; enough had been done for revenge and profit; the bunch of them were not worth a cardécu.\(^2\) The prisoner I speak of is better booty—a jolly monk riding to visit his leman,\(^3\) an I may judge by his horsegear and wearing apparel. Here cometh the worthy prelate as pert as a pyet."\(^4\) And between two yeomen was brought before the silvan throne of the outlaw chief our old friend Prior Aymer of Jorvaulx.

---

\(^1\) Totty. Dizzy, unsteady.

\(^2\) Cardécu (Quart Décu). Quarter crown; worth about thirty cents.

\(^3\) Leman. Mistress.

\(^4\) Pyet. Magpie.
CHAPTER XXXIII

Flower of warriors,
How is't with Titus Lartius?
Marcius. As with a man busied about decrees,
Condemning some to death and some to exile,
Ransoming him or pitying, threatening the other.
Coriolanus.

The captive Abbot's features and manners exhibited a himsical mixture of offended pride, and deranged folly, and bodily terror.

"Why, how now, my masters?" said he, with a voice in which all three emotions were blended. "What order is among ye? Be ye Turks or Christians, that handle a churchman. Know ye what it is, manus imponere in vos Domini? Ye have plundered my mails, torn my robe of curious cut lace, which might have served a cardinal. Other in my place would have been at his excommunica vos; but I am placable, and if ye order forth my freys, release my brethren, and restore my mails, tell me with all speed an hundred crowns to be expended in masses at the high altar of Jorvaulx Abbey, and make your monks to eat no venison until next Pentecost, it may be you'll hear little more of this mad frolic."

"Holy Father," said the chief outlaw, "it grieves me to think that you have met with such usage from any of your followers as calls for your fatherly reprehension."

"Usage!" echoed the priest, encouraged by the mildness of the silvan leader; "it were usage fit for no hound of good race, much less for a Christian, far less for a priest, and least of all for the prior of the holy community.

 manus, etc. "To lay hands on the Lord's servants."

excommunicabo vos. "I will excommunicate you."
of Jorvaulx. Here is a profane and drunken minstrel, called Allan-a-Dale—nebulo quidam— who has so insulted me with corporal punishment—nay, with death itself, as I pay not down four hundred crowns of ransom to the boot of all the treasure he hath already robbed of—gold chains and gympsal rings to an unknown value; besides what is broken and spoiled among rude hands, such as my pounct-box and silver crisp tongs."

"It is impossible that Allan-a-Dale can have treated a man of your reverend bearing," replied the abbot.

"It is true as the gospel of St. Nicodemus," said the Prior; "he swore, with many a cruel north-country oath, that he would hang me up on the highest tree in the grove of the wood."

"Did he so in very deed? Nay, then, reverend father, I think you had better comply with his demands; Allan-a-Dale is the very man to abide by his word when he has so pledged it."

"You do but jest with me," said the astounded Prior, with a forced laugh; "and I love a good jest with all my heart. But, ha! ha! ha! when the mirth has lasted a livelong night, it is time to be grave in the morning."

"And I am as grave as a father confessor," replied the prior; "you must pay a round ransom, Sir Prior; your convent is likely to be called to a new election; your place will know you no more."

"Are ye Christians," said the Prior, "and hold language to a churchman?"

---

1 Nebulo Quidam. "A certain rogue."
2 Gympsal Ring. A double ring, the parts interlocking.
3 Pounct-box. Scent-box.
4 St. Nicodemus. The "Gospel" referred to, is a work called The A.D. Pilate, ascribed to the authorship of Nicodemus.
5 Has so Pledged it. A comissary is said to have received no consolation from a certain Commander-in-Chief to whom he complained of a general officer having used some such threat toward him as that in the [Scott.]
“Christians! ay, marry are we, and have divinity among us to boot,” answered the outlaw. “Let our bux-chaplain stand forth, and expound to this reverend her the texts which concern this matter.”

The Friar, half-drunk, half-sober, had huddled a war’s frock over his green cassock, and now summoning together whatever scraps of learning he had acquired by rote in former days—“Holy father,” said he, “Deus iat salvam benignitatem vestram”—you are welcome the greenwood.”

“What profane mummercy is this?” said the Prior. friend, if thou be’st indeed of the church, it were a matter dead to show me how I may escape from these men’s odds than to stand ducking and grinning here like a merris-dancer.”

“Truly, reverend father,” said the Friar, “I know but one mode in which thou mayst escape. This is St. Andrew’s day with us; we are taking our tithes.”

“But not of the church, then, I trust, my good other?” said the Prior.

“Of church and lay,” said the Friar; “and therefore, Prior, facite vobis amicos de mammone iniquitatis—like yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, for no other friendship is like to serve your turn.”

“I love a jolly woodsman at heart,” said the Prior, thinning his tone; “come, ye must not deal too hard with me. I can well of woodcraft, and can wind a horn bear and lustily, and hollo till every oak rings again. Come, ye must not deal too hard with me.”

“Give him a horn,” said the outlaw; “we will prove the skill he boasts of.”

1 Deus, etc. “God preserve your reverence!”

2 Moreis-Dancer. Originally from moreseque, Moorish; the term was applied to professional dancers and mirth-makers.

3 facere, etc. See Luke XVI. 9.

4 Can. I know. The idea of ability often presupposes the idea of knowledge; hence in Old English, as in modern German, the verbs are frequently changed, e.g., Können sie Deutsch?
The Prior Aymer winded a blast accordingly. The captain shook his head.
“Sir Prior,” he said, “thou blowest a merry note, but may not ransom thee; we cannot afford, as the legend in a good knight’s shield hath it, to set thee free for a blast. Moreover, I have found thee: thou art one of those who, with new French graces and tra-li-ras, disturb the ancient English bugle notes. Prior, that last flourish on the reechart hath added fifty crowns to thy ransom, for corrupting the true old manly blasts of venerie.”

“Well, friend,” said the Abbot, peevishly, “thou art ill to please with thy woodcraft. I pray thee be more conformable in this matter of my ransom. At a word—since I must needs, for once, hold a candle to the dew—
what ransom am I to pay for walking on Watling Street without having fifty men at my back?”

“Were it not well,” said the lieutenant of the gay apart to the captain, “that the Prior should name the Jew’s ransom, and the Jew name the Prior’s?”

“Thou art a mad knave,” said the captain, “but plan transcends! Here, Jew, step forth. Look at holy Father Aymer, Prior of the rich Abbey of Jervaulx and tell us at what ransom we should hold him?
knowest the income of his convent, I warrant thee.”

“Oh, assuredly,” said Isaac. “I have trafficked the good fathers, and bought wheat and barley, and of the earth, and also much wool. Oh, it is a rich stede² and they do live upon the fat, and drink wines upon the lees, these good fathers of Jervaulx;
if an outcast like me had such a home to go to, a incomings by the year and by the month, I would much gold and silver to redeem my captivity.”

“Hound of a Jew!” exclaimed the Prior,

¹ VENERIE. Hunting; from Latin venari, to hunt.
² ABBEY-STEDÉ. Stede, or stead, means place; compare Homestead instead, etc.
ws better than thy own cursed self that our holy house God is indebted for the finishing of our chancel—"
"And for the storing of your cellars in the last season of the due allowance of Gascon wine," interrupted the
; "but that—that is small matters."
"Hear the infidel dog!" said the churchman; "he des as if our holy community did come under debts for wines we have a license to drink _propter necessitatem et trigus depellendum_.1 The circumcised villain blas-meth the holy church, and Christian men listen and ree him not!"
"All this helps nothing," said the leader. "Isaac, ounce what he may pay, without flaying both hide hair."
"An six hundred crowns," said Isaac, "the good Prior ht well pay to your honoured valours, and never sit less in his stall."
"Six hundred crowns," said the leader, gravely; "I am nted—thou hast well spoken, Isaac—six hundred ns. It is a sentence, Sir Prior."
"A sentence!—a sentence!" exclaimed the band;
omon had not done it better."
"Thou hearest thy doom, Prior," said the leader.
"Ye are mad, my masters," said the Prior; "where I to find such a sum? If I sell the very pyx2 and desticks on the altar at Jorvalux, I shall scarce raise half; and it will be necessary for that purpose that I to Jorvalux myself; ye may retain as borrows3 my priests."
"That will be but blind trust," said the outlaw; "we retain thee, Prior, and send them to fetch thy ran-Thou shalt not want a cup of wine and a collop4 of 1 _propter necessitatem et trigus depellendum._ In case of necessity and to keep out the cold.

2 _pyx._ A box; the depository of the Host, or consecrated wafer used at the union.
3 _borrows._ Borghs, or borrows, signifies pledges. Hence our word _to v._, because we pledge ourselves to restore what is lent. (Scot.) 4 _collop._ Slice.
venison the while; and if thou lovest woodcraft, thou shalt see such as your north country never witnessed."

"Or, if so please you," said Isaac, willing to curry favour with the outlaws, "I can send to York for the six hundred crowns, out of certain monies in my hands, if so be that the most reverend Prior present will grant me a quittance."

"He shall grant thee whatever thou dost list, Isaac," said the captain; "and thou shalt lay down the redemption money for Prior Aymer as well as for thyself."

"For myself! ah, courageous sirs," said the Jew, "I am a broken and impoverished man; a beggar's staff must be my portion through life, supposing I were to pay you fifty crowns."

"The Prior shall judge of that matter," replied the captain. "How say you, Father Aymer? Can the Jew afford a good ransom?"

"Can he afford a ransom?" answered the Prior. "If he not Isaac of York, rich enough to redeem the captivity of the ten tribes of Israel who were led into Assyrian bondage? I have seen but little of him myself, but our cellarer and treasurer have dealt largely with him, and report says that his house at York is so full of gold and silver as is a shame in any Christian land. Marvel it is to all living Christian hearts that such gnawing adders should be suffered to eat into the bowels of the state, and even of the holy church herself, with foul usuries and extortions."

"Hold, father," said the Jew, "mitigate and assuage your choler. I pray of your reverence to remember that I force my monies upon no one. But when churchman and layman, prince and prior, knight and priest, come knocking to Isaac's door, they borrow not his shekels with these uncivil terms. It is then, 'Friend Isaac, will you pleasure us in this matter, and our day shall be truly kept, so God sa' me?'—and 'Kind Isaac, if ever you served man, show urself a friend in this need!" And when the day comes, d I ask my own, then what hear I but ‘Damned Jew,’ d ‘The curse of Egypt on your tribe,’ and all that may m r up the rude and uncivil populace against poor en angers!"

"Prior," said the captain, "Jew though he be, he hath this spoken well. Do thou, therefore, name his ransom, he named thine, without farther rude terms."

"None but latro famosus\(^1\)—the interpretation where-
," said the Prior, "will I give at some other time and le—would place a Christian prelate and an unbaptized w upon the same bench. But since ye require me to put price upon this caitiff, I tell you openly that ye will wrong ourselves if you take from him a penny under a thousand owns."\(^2\)

"A sentence!—a sentence!" exclaimed the chief outlaw. "A sentence!—a sentence!" shouted his assessors; he Christian has shown his good nurture, and dealt with more generously than the Jew."

"The God of my fathers help me!" said the Jew; "will bear to the ground an impoverished creature? I n this day childless, and will ye deprive me of the means livelihood?"

"Thou wilt have the less to provide for, Jew, if thou childless," said Aymer.

"Alas! my lord," said Isaac, "your law permits you not to know how the child of our bosom is entwined with the strings of our heart. O Rebecca! daughter of my be ved Rachael! were each leaf on that tree a zecchin, and ch zecchin mine own, all that mass of wealth would I ve to know whether thou art alive, and escaped the hands the Nazarene!"

"Was not thy daughter dark-haired?" said one of the

\(^1\) LATRO FAMOSUS. "A noted robber."

\(^2\) A THOUSAND CROWNS. Compare the ransom fixed by Prior Aymer with duc-de-Haut's demands of Isaac.
outlaws; "and wore she not a veil of twisted sendal, bordered with silver?"

"She did!—she did!" said the old man, trembling with eagerness, as formerly with fear. "The blessing of Jacob be upon thee! canst thou tell me aught of her safety?"

"It was she, then," said the yeoman, "who was carried off by the proud Templar, when he broke through our ranks on yestereven. I had drawn my bow to send a shaft after him, but spared him even for the sake of the damsel, who I feared might take harm from the arrow."

"Oh," answered the Jew, "I would to God thou hadst shot, though the arrow had pierced her bosom! Better the tomb of her fathers than the dishonourable couch of the licentious and savage Templar. Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory hath departed from my house!"

"Friends," said the chief, looking round, "the old man is but a Jew, nameless his grief touches me. Deal uprightly with us, Isaac: will paying this ransom of a thousand crowns leave thee altogether penniless?"

Isaac, recalled to think of his worldly goods, the love of which, by dint of inveterate habit, contended even with his parental affection, grew pale, stammered, and could not deny there might be some small surplus.

"Well, go to, what though there be," said the outlaw, "we will not reckon with thee too closely. Without treasure thou mayst as well hope to redeem thy child from the clutches of Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert as to shoot a staff royal with a headless shaft. We will take thee at the same ransom with Prior Aymer, or rather at one hundred crowns lower, which hundred crowns shall be mine own peculiar loss, and not light upon this worshipful community; and so we shall avoid the heinous offence of rating a Jew merchant as high as a Christian prelate, and thou wilt have six [five] hundred crowns remaining to treat for thy daughter's ransom. Templars love the glitter of silver ekels as well as the sparkle of black eyes. Hasten to take thy crowns chink in the ear of De Bois-Guilbert, worse comes of it. Thou wilt find him, as our scouts have brought notice, at the next preceptory house of his order. Said I well, my merry mates?"

The yeomen expressed their wonted acquiescence in their leader's opinion; and Isaac, relieved of one-half of his apprehensions, by learning that his daughter lived, and might possibly be ransomed, threw himself at the feet of the generous outlaw, and, rubbing his beard against his skin, sought to kiss the hem of his green cassock. The captain drew himself back, and extricated himself from the Jew's grasp, not without some marks of contempt.

"Nay, beshrew thee, man, up with thee! I am English born, and love no such Eastern prostrations. Kneel to God, and not to a poor sinner like me."

"Ay, Jew," said Prior Aymer, "kneel to God, as represented in the servant of His altar, and who knows, with my sincere repentance and due gifts to the shrine of St. Robert, what grace thou mayst acquire for thyself and thy daughter Rebecca? I grieve for the maiden, for she is of fair and comely countenance: I beheld her in the lists of Ashby. Also Brian de Bois-Guilbert is one with whom may do much: bethink thee how thou mayst deserve my good word with him."

"Alas! alas!" said the Jew, "on every hand the spoilers rise against me: I am given as a prey unto the Assyrian, and a prey unto him of Egypt."

"And what else should be the lot of thy accursed race?" answered the Prior; "for what saith Holy Writ, verbum Domini projecerunt, et sapientia est nulla in eis—they have cast forth the Word of the Lord and there is no wisdom in them—propterea dado mulieres eorum extra—I will give their women to strangers, that is to the templar, as in the present matter—et thesauros eorum haeredibus alienis—and their treasures to others, as in the present case to these honest gentlemen."

Isaac groaned deeply, and began to wring his hands, and to relapse into his state of desolation and despair. But the leader of the yeomen led him aside.

"Advise thee well, Isaac," said Locksley, "what thou wilt do in this matter; my counsel to thee is to make a friend of this churchman. He is vain, Isaac, and he is covetous; at least he needs money to supply his profusion. Thou canst easily gratify his greed; for think not that I am blinded by thy pretexts of poverty. I am intimately acquainted, Isaac, with the very iron chest in which thou dost keep thy money-bags. What! know I not the great stone beneath the appletree, that leads into the vaulted chamber under thy garden at York?" The Jew grew so pale as death. "But fear nothing from me," continued the yeoman, "for we are of old acquainted. Dost thou not remember the sick yeoman whom thy fair daughter Rebecca redeemed from the gyves at York, and kept him in thy house till his health was restored, when thou didst dismiss him recovered, and with a piece of money? Unquestionably thou art, thou didst never place coin at better interest than that poor silver mark, for it has this day saved thee five hundred crowns."

"And thou art he whom we called Diccon Bend-the-Bow?" said Isaac; "I thought ever I knew the accent of thy voice."

"I am Bend-the-Bow," said the captain, "and Locksley, and have a good name besides all these."

"But thou art mistaken, good Bend-the-Bow, concerning that same vaulted apartment. So help me Heaven, as there is nought in it but some merchandises which I will gladly part with to you—one hundred yards of Linen green to make doublets to thy men, and a hundred staves of Spanish yew to make bows, and one hundred silken strings, tough, round, and sound—these will I send for thy good will, honest Diccon, an thou wilt keepce about the vault, my good Diccon."

\[ 1 \text{ VERBUM DOMINI, etc. See Jeremiah VIII. 16.} \]

Silent as a dormouse," said the outlaw; "and never came but I am grieved for thy daughter. But I may help it. The Templar's lances are too strong for my cry in the open field; they would scatter us like dust.

I but known it was Rebecca when she was borne off, nothing might have been done; but now thou must proceed by policy. Come, shall I treat for thee with Prior?"

In God's name, Diccon, an thou canst, aid me to rescue the child of my bosom!"

Do not thou interrupt me with thine ill-timed ava-

" said the outlaw, "and I will deal with him in thy

He then turned from the Jew, who followed him, how-as closely as his shadow.

Prior Aymer," said the captain, "come apart with me under this tree. Men say thou dost love wine and a smile better than beseems thy order, Sir Priest; but that I have nought to do. I have heard, too, thou love a brace of good dogs and a fleet horse, and it may be that, loving things which are costly to come by, hatest not a purse of gold. But I have never heard thou didst love oppression or cruelty. Now, here is willing to give thee the means of pleasure and pas-in a bag containing one hundred marks of silver, if intercession with thine ally the Templar shall avail to procure the freedom of his daughter."

In safety and honour, as when taken from me," said the Jew, "otherwise it is no bargain."

"Peace, Isaac," said the outlaw, "or I give up thine est. What say you to this my purpose, Priorer?"

The matter," quoith the Prior, "is of a mixed condittion; for, if I do a good deed on the one hand, yet, on the other, it goeth to the vantage of a Jew, and in so much against my conscience. Yet, if the Israelite will advantage the church by giving me somewhat over to the building of our dortour,¹ I will take it on my conscience to aid him in the matter of his daughter.”

“For a score of marks to the dortour,” said the outlaw—“Be still, I say, Isaac!—or for a brace of silver candlesticks to the altar, we will not stand with you.”

“Nay, but, good Diecon Bend-the-Bow,” said Isaac, endeavouring to interpose.

“Good Jew—good beast—good earthworm!” said the yeoman, losing patience; “an thou dost go on to put thy filthy lucre in the balance with thy daughter’s life and honour, by Heaven, I will strip thee of every maravedi thou hast in the world before three days are out!”

Isaac shrunk together, and was silent.

“And what pledge am I to have for all this?” said the Prior.

“When Isaac returns successful through your mediation,” said the outlaw, “I swear by St. Hubert, I will see that he pays thee the money in good silver, or I will reckon with him for it in such sort, he had better have put twenty such sums.”

“Well then, Jew,” said Aymer, “since I must needs meddle in this matter, let me have the use of thy writing tablets—though, hold—rather than use thy pen, I would fast for twenty-four hours, and where shall I find one?”

“If your holy scruples can dispense with using the Jew’s tablets, for the pen I can find a remedy,” said the yeoman; and, bending his bow, he aimed his shaft at a wild goose which was soaring over their heads, the advance guard of a phalanx of his tribe, which were winging their

¹ Dortour. Or dormitory. [Scott.]
² Maravedi. A Spanish coin worth about half a cent. distant and solitary fens of Holderness. The fluttering down, transfixed with the arrow.

Prior,” said the captain, “are quills enow to the monks of Jorvaulx for the next hundred they take not to writing chronicles.”

Prior sat down, and at great leisure indited an Brian de Bois-Guilbert, and having carefully
the tablets, delivered them to the Jew, saying:
be thy safe-conduct to the preceptory of Tem-nd, as I think, is most likely to accomplish the thy daughter, if it be well backed with proffers ge and commodity at thine own hand; for, trust
A good knight Bois-Guilbert is of their confraters, ought for nought.”

Prior,” said the outlaw, “I will detain thee no than to give the Jew a quittance for the six towns at which thy ransom is fixed—I accept my paymaster; and if I hear that ye boggle at m in his accompts the sum so paid by him, St.
e me, an I burn not the abbey over thine head, gang ten years the sooner!”

much worse grace than that wherewith he had letter to Bois-Guilbert, the Prior wrote an , discharging Isaac of York of six hundred vanced to him in his need for acquittal of his faithfully promising to hold true compt with that sum.

now,” said Prior Aymer, “I will pray you of of my mules and palfreys, and the freedom of brethren attending upon me, and also of the ngs, jewels, and fair vestures of which I have led, having now satisfied you for my ransom as ner.”

ing your brethren, Sir Prior,” said Locksley, have present freedom, it were unjust to detain ing your horses and mules, they shall also restored, with such spending money as may enable you to reach York, for it were cruel to deprive you of the means of journeying. But as concerning rings, jewels, chains, and what else, you must understand that we are men of tender consciences, and will not yield to a venerable man like yourself, who should be dead to the vanities of the life, the strong temptation to break the rule of his foundation, by wearing rings, chains, or other vain gauds."

"Think what you do, my masters," said the Prior, "at you put your hand on the church's patrimony. These things are inter res sacras,¹ and I wot not what judgment might ensue were they to be handled by laical hands."

"I will take care of that, reverend Prior," said the hermit of Copmanhurst; "for I will wear them myself."

"Friend, or brother," said the Prior, in answer to this solution of his doubts, "if thou hast really taken religious orders, I pray thee to look how thou wilt answer to the official for the share thou hast taken in this day's work."

"Friend Prior," returned the hermit, "you are to know that I belong to a little diocese where I am my own diocesan and care as little for the Bishop of York as I do for the Abbot of Jorvaulx, the Prior, and all the convent."

"Thou art utterly irregular," said the Prior—"one of those disorderly men who, taking on them the sacred character without due cause, profane the holy rites, and endanger the souls of those who take counsel at their hands; lapides pro pane condonantes iis,² giving them stones instead of bread, as the Vulgate hath it."

"Nay," said the Friar, "an my brain-pan could have been broken by Latin, it had not held so long together. I say, that easing a world of such misprond priests as thou art of their jewels and their gimcracks is a lawful spoiling of the Egyptians."

¹ Inter res sacras. "Among sacred things."
² Lapides, etc. See Luke XI. 11.
"Thou be'st a hedge-priest," said the Prior, in great excommunicabo vos."

"Thou be'st thyself more like a thief and a heretic," the Friar, equally indignant; "I will pouch up no affront before my parishioners as thou thinkest it shame to put upon me, although I be a reverend her to thee. Ossa ejus perfringam, I will break bones, as the Vulgate hath it."

"Hola!" cried the captain, "come the reverend brethren to such terms? Keep thine assurance of peace, Friar, or, an thou hast not made thy peace perfect with God, roke the Friar no further. Hermit, let the reverend her depart in peace, as a ransomed man."

The yeomen separated the incensed priests, who contented to raise their voices, vituperating each other in badin, which the Prior delivered the more fluently, and the Friar with the greater vehemence. The Prior at length collected himself sufficiently to be aware that he was promising his dignity by squabbling with such a ge-priest as the outlaw's chaplain, and being joined by attendants, rode off with considerably less pomp, and much more apostolical condition, so far as worldly matters were concerned, than he had exhibited before this ren-ner.

It remained that the Jew should produce some secur for the ransom which he was to pay on the Prior's ac-nt, as well as upon his own. He gave, accordingly, an er sealed with his signet, to a brother of his tribe at rk, requiring him to pay to the bearer the sum of a usand [eleven hundred] crowns, and to deliver certain chandises specified in the note.

"My brother Sheva," he said, groaning deeply, "hath key of my warehouses."

HEDGE-PRIEST. See Appendix, Note G. [Scott.]

Ossa, etc. See Isaiah XXXVIII. 13.
“And of the vaulted chamber,” whispered Locksley.
“No, no—may Heaven forefend!” said Isaac; “evil is the hour that let any one whomsoever into that secret!”
“It is safe with me,” said the outlaw, “so be that this thy scroll produce the sum therein nominated and set down. But what now, Isaac? art dead? art stupefied? hath the payment of a thousand crowns put thy daughter’s peril out of thy mind?”

The Jew started to his feet: “No, Diccon, no; I will presently set forth. Farewell, thou whom I may not call good, and dare not, and will not, call evil.”

Yet, ere Isaac departed, the outlaw chief bestowed on him this parting advice: “Be liberal of thine offers, Isaac, and spare not thy purse for thy daughter’s safety. Credit me, that the gold thou shalt spare in her cause will hereafter give thee as much agony as if it were poured molten down thy throat.”

Isaac acquiesced with a deep groan, and set forth on his journey, accompanied by two tall foresters, who were to be his guides, and at the same time his guards, through the wood.

The Black Knight, who had seen with no small interest these various proceedings, now took his leave of the outlaw in turn; nor could he avoid expressing his surprise at having witnessed so much of civil policy amongst persons cast out from all the ordinary protection and influence of the laws.

“Good fruit, Sir Knight,” said the yeoman, “sometimes grow on a sorry tree; and evil times are not always productive of evil alone and unmixed. Among those who are drawn into this lawless state, there are doubtless, numbers who wish to exercise its license with some moderation, and some who regret, it may be, that they are obliged to follow such a trade at all.”

“And to one of those,” said the Knight, “I assume, speaking?”
Sir Knight," said the outlaw, "we have each our se-
You are welcome to form your judgment of me,
I may use my conjectures touching you, though her of our shafts may hit the mark they are shot at.
as I do not pray to be admitted into your mystery, be offended that I preserve my own."
I crave pardon, brave outlaw," said the Knight, or reproof is just. But it may be we shall meet herewith less of concealment on either side. Meanwhile art friends, do we not?"
There is my hand upon it," said Locksley; "and I call it the hand of a true Englishman, though an out-for the present."
And there is mine in return," said the Knight, "and it honoured by being clasped with yours. For he does good, having the unlimited power to do evil, de-praise not only for the good which he performs, or the evil which he forbears. Fare thee well, gal-outlaw!"
thus parted that fair fellowship; and he of the Fetek, mounting upon his strong war-horse, rode off gh the forest.¹

¹ The Foresters. Tennyson's picturesque drama, The Foresters, deals with the es of Robin Hood and his companions, introducing also Prince John brother Richard.
CHAPTER XXXIV

King John. I'll tell thee what, my friend,
He is a very serpent in my way;
And wheresoe'er this foot of mine doth tread,
He lies before me. Dost thou understand me?

King John.

There was brave feasting in the Castle of York, which Prince John had invited those nobles, prelates, and leaders by whose assistance he hoped to carry through ambitious projects upon his brother's throne. Walde Fitzurse, his able and politic agent, was at secret among them, tempering all to that pitch of courage was necessary in making an open declaration of their pose. But their enterprise was delayed by the absence of more than one main limb of the confederacy; stubborn and daring, though brutal, courage of Er Bœuf; the buoyant spirits and bold bearing of De Brian de Bois-Guilbert, were important to the success of their conspiracy; and, while cursing in secret necessary and unmeaning absence, neither John adviser dared to proceed without them. Isaac also seemed to have vanished, and with him the certain sums of money, making up the subsidy Prince John had contracted with that Israelite brethren. This deficiency was likely to prove an emergency so critical.

It was on the morning after the fall of 74 that a confused report began to spread about of York that De Bracy and Bois-Guilbert... rate Front-de-Bœuf, had been taken or slain. Wal- dar brought the rumour to Prince John, announcing, he feared its truth the more that they had set out a small attendance, for the purpose of committing an act on the Saxon Cedric and his attendants. At another time the Prince would have treated this deed of enmity as a good jest; but now that it interfered with and added his own plans, he exclaimed against the perpetors, and spoke of the broken laws, and the infringement of public order and of private property, in a tone which might have become King Alfred.
The unprincipled marauders!” he said; “were I ever to become monarch of England, I would hang such trans-gressors over the drawbridges of their own castles.”
But to become monarch of England,” said his Ahitho-phel coolly, “it is necessary not only that your Grace endure the transgressions of these unprincipled marauders, but that you should afford them your protection notwithstanding your laudable zeal for the laws they have infringed. We shall be finely helped, churl! Saxons should have realised your Grace’s vision of inverting feudal drawbridges into gibbets; and yon-proud-spirited Cedric seemeth one to whom such an innovation might occur. Your Grace is well aware, it be dangerous to stir without Front-de-Bœuf, De-uy, and the Templar; and yet we have gone too far to be with safety.”
Prince John struck his forehead with impatience, and began to stride up and down the apartment.
“The villains,” he said—“the base, treacherous villains, arrest me at this pinch?”
Nay, say rather the feather-pated, giddy madmen,” Waldemar, “who must be toying with follies when business was in hand.”

Ahithophel. Ahithophel was the counselor of King David, but followed him in his rebellion to his own destruction. See 2 Samuel XV. 31–XVII. also Dryden’s satire, Absalom and Achitophel.
“What is to be done?” said the Prince, stopping short before Waldemar.

“I know nothing which can be done,” answered his counsellor, “save that which I have already taken order for; I came not to bewail this evil chance with your Grace until I had done my best to remedy it.”

“Thou art ever my better angel, Waldemar,” said the Prince; “and when I have such a chancellor to advise withal, the reign of John will be renowned in our annals. What hast thou commanded?”

“I have ordered Louis Winkelbrand, De Bracy’s lieutenant, to cause his trumpet sound to horse, and to display his banner and to set presently forth towards the castle of Front-de-Bœuf, to do what yet may be done for the succour of our friends.”

Prince John’s face flushed with the pride of a spoilt child who has undergone what it conceives to be an insult much hast thou taken upon thee! and over-malapert wert to cause trumpet to blow, or banner to be raised, in town where ourselves were in presence, without our express command.”

“I crave your Grace’s pardon,” said Fitzurse, intercursing the idle vanity of his patron; “but when pressed, and even the loss of minutes might be judged it best to take this much burden upon me, in ter of such importance to your Grace’s interest.”

“Thou art pardoned, Fitzurse,” said the Prince, “thy purpose hath atoned for thy hasty rashness whom have we here? De Bracy himself, by the road in strange guise doth he come before us.”

It was indeed De Bracy, “bloody with spurred red with speed.” His armour bore all the marks of obstinate fray, being broken, defaced, and stag blood in many places, and covered with clay and crest to the spur. Undoing his helmet, he placed it on a table, and stood a moment as if to collect himself before he told his news.
IVANHOE

"De Bracy," said Prince John, "what means this? Speak, I charge thee! Are the Saxons in rebellion?"

"Speak, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, almost in the same tone with his master, "thou wert wont to be a man. Where is the Templar? where Front-de-Bœuf?"

"The Templar is fled," said De Bracy; "Front-de-Bœuf will never see more. He has found a red grave among the blazing rafters of his own castle, and I alone am sent to tell you."

"Cold news," said Waldemar, "to us, though you speak true and conflagration."

"The worst news is not yet said," answered De Bracy; coming up to Prince John, he uttered in a low and hasty tone: "Richard is in England; I have seen and spoken with him."

Prince John turned pale, tottered, and caught at the side of an oaken bench to support himself, much like to a man who receives an arrow in his bosom.

"Thou ravest, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, "it cannot be."

"It is as true as truth itself," said De Bracy; "I was his prisoner, and spoke with him."

"With Richard Plantagenet, sayest thou?" continued Fitzurse.

"And thou wert his prisoner?" said Waldemar; "he is at the head of a power?"

"No; only a few outlawed yeomen were around him, and these his person is unknown. I heard him say he was about to depart from them. He joined them only to resist at the storming of Torquilstone."

"Ay," said Fitzurse, "such is indeed the fashion of the times—a true knight-errant he, and will wander in wild adventure, trusting the prowess of his single arm, like an SIR GUY or SIR BEVIS, while the weighty affairs of his kingdom slumber, and his own safety is endangered. What dost thou propose to do, De Bracy?

"I? I offered Richard the service of my Free Lance and he refused them. I will lead them to Hull, seize on shipping, and embark for Flanders; thanks to the bustling times, a man of action will always find employment. And thou, Waldemar, wilt thou take lance and shield, and all down thy policies, and wend along with me, and share the fate which God sends us?"

"I am too old, Maurice, and I have a daughter," answered Waldemar.

"Give her to me, Fitzurse, and I will maintain her, fits her rank, with the help of lance and stirrup," said De Bracy.

"Not so," answered Fitzurse; "I will take sanctuary in this church of St. Peter; the Archbishop is my sworn brother."

During this discourse, Prince John had gradually awakened from the stupor into which he had been thrown by the unexpected intelligence, and had been attentive to the conversation which passed betwixt his followers. "The fall off from me," he said to himself: "they hold no more by me than a withered leaf by the bough when a breeze blows on it! Hell and fiends! can I shape no means for myself when I am deserted by these cravens?" He paused, and there was an expression of diabolical passion in the constrained laugh with which he at length broke in on their conversation.

"Ha, ha, ha! my good lords, by the light of Our Lady's brow, I held ye sage men, bold men, ready-witted men...

1 SIR GUY or SIR BEVIS. Guy of Warwick and Bevis of Hampton, heroes of early English romance.

2 SANCTUARY. York Cathedral was one of the sacred places which possessed the privilege of granting immunity to those who demanded their protection from the law. At this time the Archbishop of York was Geoffrey, half-brother of Richard and John.
things which are costly to come by; yet ye throw wealth, honour, pleasure, all that our noble game
ed you, at the moment it might be won by one bold understand you not," said De Bracy. "As soon as I's return is blown abroad, he will be at the head of y, and all is then over with us. I would counsel y lord, either to fly to France or take the protection Queen Mother."1 seek no safety for myself," said Prince John, haughtthat I could secure by a word spoken to my brother.
ough you, De Bracy, and you, Waldemar Fitzurse, ady to abandon me, I should not greatly delight to ur heads blackening on Clifford’s gate yonder.
sthou, Waldemar, that the wily Archbishop will fer thee to be taken from the very horns of the ould it make his peace with King Richard? And est thou, De Bracy, that Robert Estoteville lies bene and Hull with all his forces, and that the Earl of s gathering his followers? If we had reason to fear evies even before Richard’s return, trowest thou any doubt now which party their leaders will take?
e, Estoteville alone has strength enough to drive Free Lances into the Humber." Waldemar Fitz-d De Bracy looked in each other’s faces with blank
. "There is but one road to safety," continued the
and his brow grew black as midnight: "this object terror journeys alone; he must be met withal."
not by me," said De Bracy, hastily; "I was his prisand he took me to mercy. I will not harm a feather erest."
ho spoke of harming him?" said Prince John, with med laugh; "the knave will say next that I meant dl slay him! No—a prison were better; and or in Britain or Austria, what matters it? Things

MOTHER. Eleanor, the widow of Henry II.
will be but as they were when we commenced our enterprise. It was founded on the hope that Richard would remain a captive in Germany. Our uncle Robert¹ lived and died in the castle of Cardiff.”

“Ay, but,” said Waldemar, “your sire Henry sat more firm in his seat than your Grace can. I say the best proof is that which is made by the sexton: no dungeon nor church-vault! I have said my say.”

“Prison or tomb,” said De Bracy, “I wash my hands of the whole matter.”

“Villain!” said Prince John, “thou wouldst not be wray our counsel?”

“Counsel was never bewrayed by me,” said De Bracy, haughtily, “nor must the name of villain be coupled with mine!”

“Peace, Sir Knight!” said Waldemar; “and you, my lord, forgive the scruples of valiant De Bracy; I trust shall soon remove them.”

“That passes your eloquence, Fitzurse,” replied the knight.

“Why, good Sir Maurice,” rejoined the wily politie, “start not aside like a scared steed, without, at least, considering the object of your terror. This Richard—day since, and it would have been thy dearest wish to meet him hand to hand in the ranks of battle; a hundred times I have heard thee wish it.”

“Ay,” said De Bracy, “but that was, as thou say’st, hand to hand, and in the ranks of battle! Thou hearest me breathe a thought of assaulting him alone in a forest.”

“Thou art no good knight if thou dost scruple at all,” said Waldemar. “Was it in battle that Lancelot de Lacy and Sir Tristram² won renown? or was it not by encounter?”

¹ Robert. The eldest son of William L., was kept a prisoner until death, by his brother, Henry I., the grandfather, not the “sire,” of John Richard.

² LANCELOT DE LACY AND SIR TRISTRAM. Two famous knights of Arthur’s Round Table. See Tennyson’s Idylls of the King. gigantic knights under the shade of deep and unknown
ights?

"Ay, but I promise you," said De Bracy, "that neither tried nor Lancelot would have been match, hand to for Richard Plantagenet, and I think it was not their to take odds against a single man."

"Thou art mad, De Bracy: what is it we propose to thee, red and retained captain of Free Companions, whose lords are purchased for Prince John's service? Thou art risen of our enemy, and then thou scruplest, though patron's fortunes, those of thy comrades, thine own, the life and honour of every one amongst us, be at
!

"I tell you," said De Bracy, sullenly, "that he gave me life. True, he sent me from his presence, and refused homage, so far I owe him neither favour nor allegiance;
I will not lift hand against him."

"It needs not; send Louis Winkelbrand and a score of lances."

"Ye have sufficient ruffians of your own," said De cey; "not one of mine shall budge on such an errand."

"Art thou so obstinate, De Bracy?" said Prince John;
d wilt thou forsake me, after so many protestations of
for my service?"

"I mean it not," said De Bracy; "I will abide by you in ht that becomes a knight, whether in the lists or in camp; but this highway practice comes not within my

"Come hither, Waldemar," said Prince John. "An unppy prince am I. My father, King Henry, had faithful ants. He had but to say that he was plagued with a ious priest, and the blood of Thomas à Becket, saint ugh he was, stained the steps of his own altar. Tracy, ville, Brito, loyal and daring subjects, your names,

TRACY, etc. Reginald Fitzurse, William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, Richard Brito were the gentlemen of Henry the Second's household, who, ated by some passionate expressions of their sovereign, slew the celethomas à Becket. [Scott.]
your spirit, are extinct! and although Reginald Fitzurse hath left a son, he hath fallen off from his father’s fidelity and courage.”

“He has fallen off from neither,” said Waldemar Fitzurse; “and since it may not better be, I will take on me the conduct of this perilous enterprise. Dearly, however, did my father purchase the praise of a zealous friend; and yet did his proof of loyalty to Henry fall far short of what I am about to afford; for rather would I assail a whole calendar of saints than put spear in rest against Cœur-de-Lion. De Bracy, to thee I must trust to keep up the spirits of the doubtful, and to guard Prince John’s person. If you receive such news as I trust to send you, our enterprise will no longer wear a doubtful aspect. Page,” he said, “hie to my lodgings, and tell my armurer to be there in readiness; and bid Stephen Wetheral, Broad Thoresby, and the Three Spears of Spyinghow come to me instantly; and let the scout-master, Hugh Bardon, attend me also. Adieu, my Prince, till better times.” Thus speaking, he left the apartment.

“He goes to make my brother prisoner,” said Prince John to De Bracy, “with as little touch of compunction as if it but concerned the liberty of a Saxon franklin. I trust he will observe our orders, and use our dear Richard’s person with all due respect.”

De Bracy only answered by a smile.

“By the light of Our Lady’s brow,” said Prince John, “our orders to him were most precise, though it may be you heard them not, as we stood together in the oriel window. Most clear and positive was our charge that Richard’s safety should be cared for, and woe to Waldemar’s head if he transgress it!”

“I had better pass to his lodgings,” said De Bracy, “and make him fully aware of your Grace’s pleasure; for, as it quite escaped my ear, it may not perchance have reached that of Waldemar.”
IVANHOE

“nay, nay,” said Prince John, impatiently, “I promise I heard me; and, besides, I have farther occupation elsewhere. Maurice, come hither; let me lean on thy shoulder. I walked a turn through the hall in this familiar manner, and Prince John, with an air of the most cordial intimacy, proceeded to say: “What thinkest thou of Waldemar Fitzurse, my De Bracy? He trusts to be chancellor. Surely we will pause ere we give an office to one who shows evidently how little he reverences our blood, by his so readily undertaking this enterprize against Richard. Thou dost think, I warrant, that I must lose somewhat of our regard by thy boldly declining this unpleasing task. But no, Maurice! I rather honor thee for thy virtuous constancy. There are things necessary to be done, the perpetrator of which we love nor honour; and there may be refusals to such which shall rather exalt in our estimation those who deny our request. The arrest of my unfortunate prisoner forms no such good title to the high office of chancellor as thy chivalrous and courageous denial established thee to the truncheon of High Marshal. Think De Bracy, and begone to thy charge.”

“Tyrant!” muttered De Bracy, as he left the Prince; “evil luck have they who trust thee, chancellor, indeed! He who hath the keeping of conscience shall have an easy charge, I trow. But Marshal of England! that,” he said, extending his arm to grasp the baton of office, and assuming a loftier air along the ante-chamber—“that is indeed a prize playing for!”

Bracy had no sooner left the apartment than Prince summoned an attendant.

And Hugh Bardon, our scout-master, come hither, as he shall have spoken with Waldemar Fitzurse.”

scout-master arrived after a brief delay, during...
IVANHOE

which John traversed the apartment with unequal and staggered steps.

"Bardon," said he, "what did Waldemar desire?"

"Two resolute men, well acquainted with the wilds, and skilful in tracking the tread of morse."

"And thou hast fitted him?"

"Let your Grace never trust me else," answered master of the spies. "One is from Hexhamshire wont to trace the Tynedale and Teviotdale the bloodhound follows the slot of a hurt deer. He is Yorkshire bred, and has twanged his bowstring in merry Sherwood; he knows each glade and dale, and high-wood, betwixt this and Richmond."

"'Tis well," said the Prince. "Goes Wald with them?"

"Instantly," said Bardon.

"With what attendance?" asked John, care
"Broad Thoresby goes with him, and Wet
they call, for his cruelty, Stephen Steel-Heart, northern men-at-arms that belonged to Ralph's
gang; they are called the Spears of Spyinghow.

"'Tis well," said Prince John; then a moment's pause: "Bardon, it imports our ser keep a strict watch on Maurice De Bracy, s not observe it, however. And let us know from time to time, with whom he converses with. Fail not in this, as thou wilt be an Hugh Bardon bowed, and retired.

"If Maurice betrays me," said Prince J trays me, as his bearing leads me to fear head, were Richard thundering at the gates.

1 Slot. The track of a deer or other animal of the cure slot-hound (also slow and stealthy).
2 Prince John. Shakespeare in King John use ure of John after he has assumed the crown are, especially King John III.'s.
CHAPTER XXXV

Arouse the tiger of Hyrcanian deserts,
Strive with the half-starved lion for his prey;
Lesser the risk, than rouse the slumbering fire
Of wild Fanaticism.

Anonymous.

tale now returns to Isaac of York. Mounted upon the gift of the outlaw, with two tall yeomen to act
-guard and guides, the Jew had set out for the pre-of Templestowe, for the purpose of negotiating his er’s redemption. The preceptory was but a day’s from the demolished castle of Torquilstone, and had hoped to reach it before nightfall; accordving dismissed his guides at the verge of the for-rewarded them with a piece of silver, he began on with such speed as his weariness permitted him
. But his strength failed him totally ere he had within four miles of the Temple court; racking not along his back and through his limbs, and the anguish which he felt at heart being now aug-by bodily suffering, he was rendered altogether in-
of proceeding farther than a small market-town, welt a Jewish rabbi of his tribe, eminent in the profession, and to whom Isaac was well known.
Ben Israel received his suffering countrymen with kindness which the law prescribed, and which the actised to each other. He insisted on his betak-self to repose, and used such remedies as were then repute to check the progress of the fever which fatigue, ill-usage, and sorrow had brought upon old Jew.
hich John traversed the apartment with unequal and dis-ordered steps.

“Bardon,” said he, “what did Waldemar desire of thee?”

“Two resolute men, well acquainted with these northern wilds, and skilful in tracking the tread of man and horse.”

“And thou hast fitted him?”

“Let your Grace never trust me else,” answered the master of the spies. “One is from Hexhamshire; he wont to trace the Tynedale and Teviotdale thieves, a bloodhound follows the slot\(^1\) of a hurt deer. The other is Yorkshire bred, and has twanged his bowstring right in merry Sherwood; he knows each glade and dingle, as

and high-wood, betwixt this and Richmond.”

“ ’Tis well,” said the Prince. “Goes Waldemar with them?”

“Instantly,” said Bardon.

“With what attendance?” asked John, carelessly

“Broad Thoresby goes with him, and Wetheral they call, for his cruelty, Stephen Steel-Heart; at northern men-at-arms that belonged to Ralph Mie-gang; they are called the Spears of Spyinghow.”

“ ’Tis well,” said Prince John; then added a moment’s pause: “Bardon, it imports our service to keep a strict watch on Maurice De Bracy, so that we not observe it, however. And let us know of him from time to time, with whom he converses, what poseth. Fail not in this, as thou wilt be answer-

Hugh Bardon bowed, and retired.

“If Maurice betrays me,” said Prince John, trays me, as his bearing leads me to fear, I will head, were Richard thundering at the gates of Y

\(^1\) Slot. The track of a deer or other animal of the chase;
pare slot-hound (also slow and stealth).

\(^2\) Prince John. Shakspere in King John presents the traiture of John after he has assumed the crown. In chapter compare, especially, King John III., 3.
CHAPTER XXXV

Arouse the tiger of Hyrcanian deserts,
Strive with the half-starved lion for his prey;
Lesser the risk, than rouse the slumbering fire
Of wild Fanaticism.

Anonymous.

Our tale now returns to Isaac of York. Mounted upon a post, the gift of the outlaw, with two tall yeomen to act as his guard and guides, the Jew had set out for the preceptory of Templestowe, for the purpose of negotiating his father's redemption. The preceptory was but a day's journey from the demolished castle of Torquilstone, and
the Jew had hoped to reach it before nightfall; accordingly, having dismissed his guides at the verge of the for-mont, and rewarded them with a piece of silver, he began
on with such speed as his weariness permitted him.
But his strength failed him totally ere he had advanced within four miles of the Temple court; racking shot along his back and through his limbs, and the severe anguish which he felt at heart being now augmented by bodily suffering, he was rendered altogether incapable of proceeding farther than a small market-town, where dwelt a Jewish rabbi of his tribe, eminent in the
rabbinical profession, and to whom Isaac was well known.

Ben Israel received his suffering countrymen with kindness which the law prescribed, and which the rabbi himself practised to each other. He insisted on his betak-ning himself to rest, and used such remedies as were then most in use to check the progress of the fever which had brought him to the old Jew.
On the morrow, when Isaac proposed to arise and sue his journey, Nathan remonstrated against his plan both as his host and as his physician. "It might kill him," he said, "his life." But Isaac replied, "The less than life and death depended upon his going that night to Templestowe."

"To Templestowe!" said his host with surprise. He felt his pulse, and then muttered to himself, "His heart abated, yet seems his mind somewhat alienated and disturbed."

"And why not to Templestowe?" answered the guest. "I grant thee, Nathan, that it is a dwelling of which the despised Children of the Promise are a stumbling-block and an abomination; yet thou knowest the pressing affairs of traffic sometimes carry us among bloodthirsty Nazarene soldiers, and that we visit septs of the Templars, as well as the commandery of the Knights Hospitallers, as they are called."

"I know it well," said Nathan; "but wottest thou of Lucas de Beaumanoir, the chief of their order, and they term Grand Master, is now himself at Templestowe."

"I know it not," said Isaac; "our last letters from the brethren at Paris avised us that he was at that city, seeking Philip for aid against the Sultan Saladin."

"He hath since come to England, unexpected guest, the brethren," said Ben Israel; "and he cometh amongst us with a strong and outstretched arm to correct and punish. His countenance is kindled in anger against those who have departed from the vow which they have made, and great is the fear of those sons of Belial. They have heard of his name?"

"It is well known unto me," said Isaac: "the 1 Commanderies. The establishments of the Knight Templars were known as Preceptories, and the title of those who presided in the order was Commander. As the principal Knights of Saint John were termed Commanders of their houses Commanderies. But these terms were sometimes used indiscriminately. [Scott.]" ever1 this Lucas Beaumanoir as a man zealous to slay; for every point of the Nazarene law; and our brethren termed him a fierce destroyer of the Saracens, and a tyrant to the Children of the Promise.”

And truly have they termed him,” said Nathan theician. “Other Templars may be moved from the pur-purpof their heart by pleasure, or bribed by promise of of and silver; but Beaumanoir is of a different stamp—dogsing sensuality, despising treasure, and pressing forward at which they call the crown of martyrdom—the God Jacob speedily send it unto him, and unto them all! Specially hath this proud man extended his glove over the chen of Judah, as holy David over Edom, holding the order of a Jew to be an offering of as sweet savour as death of a Saracen. Impious and false things has he even of the virtues of our medicines, as if they were devises of Satan—the Lord rebuke him!”

Nevertheless,” said Isaac, “I must present myself at plestowe, though he hath made his face like unto a furnace seven times heated.”

He then explained to Nathan the pressing cause of his journey. The Rabbi listened with interest, and testified sympathy after the fashion of his people, rending his eyes and saying, “Ah, my daughter!—ah, my daughter! Alas! for the beauty of Zion! Alas! for the captivity of Israel!”

Thou seest,” said Isaac, “how it stands with me, and I may not tarry. Peradventure, the presence of this Beaumanoir, being the chief man over them, may Brian de Bois-Guilbert from the ill which he doth state, and that he may deliver to me my beloved daughter Rebecca.”

Go thou,” said Nathan Ben Israel, “and be wise, for none availed Daniel in the den of lions into which he cast; and may it go well with thee, even as thine heart.
wisheth. Yet, if thou canst, keep thee from the preceptor of the Grand Master, for to do foul scorn to our people, his morning and evening delight. It may be, if couldst speak with Bois-Guilbert in private, thou shalt better prevail with him; for men say that these accursed Nazarenes are not of one mind in the preceptor; their counsels be confounded and brought to shame. I do thou, brother, return to me as if it were to the house of thy father, and bring me word how it has sped with thee. and well do I hope thou wilt bring with thee Rebecca, the scholar of the wise Miriam, whose cures the Gentiles slandered as if they had been wrought by necromancy.

Isaac accordingly bade his friend farewell, and an hour's riding brought him before the preceptor of Templestowe.

This establishment of the Templars was seated upon fair meadows and pastures, which the devotion of former preceptors had bestowed upon their order. strong and well fortified, a point never neglected by the knights, and which the disordered state of England rendered peculiarly necessary. Two halberdiers, clad in black, guarded the drawbridge, and others, in the same livery, glided to and fro upon the walls with a funereal resemblance to the spectres more than soldiers. The inferiors of the order were thus dressed, ever since their white garments, similar to those of the knights esquires, had given rise to a combination of certain brethren in the mountains of Palestine, terming themselves Templars, and bringing great dishonour on the order. A knight was now and then seen to cross the bridge in his long white cloak, his head depressed on his breast, and his arms folded. They passed each other, if chanced to meet, with a slow, solemn, and mute greeting, for such was the rule of their order, quoting therewith holy texts,¹ "In many words thou shalt not enrich..." fe and death are in the power of the tongue.” In a d, the stern, ascetic rigour of the Temple discipline, ch had been so long exchanged for prodigal and licenins indulgence, seemed at once to have revived at Temtowe under the severe eye of Lucas Beaumanoir.
Isaac paused at the gate, to consider how he might seek rance in the manner most likely to bespeak favour; for was well aware that to his unhappy race the reviving aticism of the order was not less dangerous than their principled licentiousness; and that his religion would be object of hate and persecution in the one case, as his
th would have exposed him in the other to the extor-
s of unrelenting oppression.
Meantime, Lucas Beaumanoir walked in a small garden
onging to the preceptory, included within the precincts its exterior fortification, and held sad and confidential unication with a brother of his order, who had come his company from Palestine.
The Grand Master was a man advanced in age, as was ified by his long grey beard, and the shaggy grey eys,
, overhanging eyes of which, however, years had bee
ble to quench the fire. A formidable warrior, his thr severe features retained the soldier’s fierceness of exion; an ascetic bigot, they were no less marked by the iation of abstinence, and the spiritual pride of the satisfied devotee. Yet with these severer traits of ognomy, there was mixed somewhat striking and
, arising, doubtless, from the great part which his office called upon him to act among monarchs and
ces, and from the habitual exercise of supreme author-ver the valiant and high-born knights who were united the rules of the order. His stature was tall, and his
, undepressed by age and toil, was erect and stately.
white mantle was shaped with severe regularity, acing to the rule of St. Bernard himself, being com posed of what was then called burrel cloth, exactly to the size of the wearer, and bearing on the left shoulder the octagonal cross peculiar to the order, formed of cloth. No vair or ermine decked this garment; respect of his age, the Grand Master, as permitted by rules, wore his doublet lined and trimmed with the lambskin, dressed with the wool outwards, which was nearest approach he could regularly make to the fur, then the greatest luxury of dress. In his hand he had that singular abacus, or staff of office, with which the Templars are usually represented, having at the upper end a plate, on which was engraved the cross of the order, scribed within a circle or orle, as heralds term it, his companion, who attended on this great personage, wore nearly the same dress in all respects, but his extreme reverence towards his superior showed that no other office subsisted between them. The preceptor, for such he was in rank, walked not in a line with the Grand Master, but just so far behind that Beaumanoir could speak to him without turning round his head.

"Conrade," said the Grand Master, "dear companion, by battles and my toils, to thy faithful bosom alone confide my sorrows. To thee alone can I tell how since I came to this kingdom, I have desired to be disengaged and to be with the just. Not one object in England met mine eye which it could rest upon with pleasure. The tombs of our brethren, beneath the massive roof of Temple Church in yonder proud capital. "O worthy Robert de Ros!" did I exclaim internally, as I gazed on these good soldiers of the cross, where they lie sculpted on their sepulchres—'O worthy William de Mars, open your marble cells, and take to your reposes your brother, who would rather strive with a hundred thousand pagans than witness the decay of our holy order.'"

1 Vair. Some sort of fur.

2 Temple Church. This edifice is still standing as a part of the Temple in the City of London. It was consecrated in 1185, and... not but true," answered Conrade Mont-Fitchet—"it is too true; and the irregularities of our brethren in and are even more gross than those in France."
Because they are more wealthy," answered the Grand Prieur. "Bear with me, brother, although I should someaud myself. Thou knowest the life I have led, from each point of my order, striving with devils em-and disembodied, striking down the roaring lion, both about seeking whom he may devour, like a good and devout priest, wheresoever I met with him, as blessed St. Bernard hath prescribed to us in the fifth capital of our rule, Ut leo semp. feriat. But, the Holy Temple! the zeal which hath devoured my ance and my life, yea, the very nerves and marrow of ines—by that very Holy Temple I swear to thee, that myself and some few that still retain the ancient ity of our order, I look upon no brethren whom I can my soul to embrace under that holy name. What statutes, and how do our brethren observe them?
should wear no vain or worldly ornament, no crest their helmet, no gold upon stirrup or bridle-bit; yet how go pranked out so proudly and so gaily as the soldiers of the Temple? They are forbidden by our es to take one bird by means of another, to shoot with bow or arblast, to halloo to a hunting-horn, or ur the horse after game; but now, at hunting and ng, and each idle sport of wood and river, who so as the Templars in all these fond vanities? They bidden to read, save what their superior permitted, hen to what is read, save such holy things as may be aloud during the hours of refection; but lo! their are at the command of idle minstrels, and their eyes

TAL. Chapter.
Leo, etc. In the ordinances of the Knights of the Temple this phrase ated in a variety of forms, and occurs in almost every chapter, as it is signal-word of the Order; which may account for its being so freient in the grand master's mouth. [Scott.] The phrase means "That Satan should always be smitten down." See 1 Peter V. S.
They were commanded to extirpate magic and heresy; lo! they are charged with studying the accursed cabalistical secrets of the Jews, and the magic of the paynim Saracens. Simplicity of diet was prescribed to them—roots, pottage, gruels, eating flesh thrice a-week, because the accustomed feeding on flesh is a dishonourable corruption of the body; and behold, the tables groan under delicate fare. Their drink was water; and now, to drink like a Templar is the boon of each jolly booj companion. This very garden, filled with curious herbs and trees sent from Eastern climes, better becomes the harem of an unbelieving Emir than the plot which Christian monks should devote to raising homely pot-herbs. And oh, Comrade! well it were the relaxation of discipline stopped even here! We knowest that we were forbidden to receive those women who at the beginning were associated as our order, because, saith the forty-sixth chapter, Ancient Enemy hath, by female society, withdrawn from the right path to paradise. Nay, in the last being, as it were, the copestone which our blessed place on the pure and undefiled doctrine which enjoined, we are prohibited from offering, even the kiss of affection: \textit{mulierum fugiantur oscula}. I shame to speak to think—of the corruptions which have rushed us even like a flood. The souls of our pure fellow spirits of Hugh de Payen and Godfrey de St. Omer, the blessed seven who first joined in dedicating to the service of the Temple, are disturbed even enjoyment of paradise itself. I have seen them the visions of the night: their sainted eyes shone the sins and follies of their brethren, and for...
neful luxury in which they wallow. 'Beaumanoir,' say, 'thou slumberest; awake! There is a stain in the face of the Temple, deep and foul as that left by the ulks of leprosy on the walls of the infected houses of

The soldiers of the Cross, who should shun the face of a woman as the eye of a basilisk, live in open sin, with the females of their own race only, but with the fathers of the accursed heathen, and more accursed.

Beaumanoir, thou sleepest; up, and avenge our race! Slay the sinners, male and female! Take to thee brand of Phinehas!' The vision fled, Conrade, but as I asked I could still hear the clank of their mail, and see waving of their white mantles. And I will do according to their word: I will purify the fabric of the Temple and the unclean stones in which the plague is, I will love and cast out of the building."

'Yet bethink thee, reverend father,' said Mont-Fitchet, 'the stain hath become engrained by time and custom; let thy reformation be cautious, as it is just and proper.'

'No, Mont-Fitchet,' answered the stern old man, 'it be sharp and sudden; the order is on the crisis of its existence. The sobriety, self-devotion, and piety of our predecessors made us powerful friends; our presumption, our wealth, our luxury have raised up against us mighty enemies. We must cast away these riches, which are a temptation to princes; we must lay down that presumption, which is an offence to them; we must reform that license of manners, which is a scandal to the whole Christian world! Or—mark my words—the order of the Temple must be utterly demolished, and the place thereof shall no more be known among the nations.'

'Now may God avert such a calamity!' said the prior.

IVANHOE. See the 13th chapter of Leviticus. [Scott.]

INHEAS. See Numbers XXV. 7, 8.
“Amen,” said the Grand Master, with solemnity, we must deserve His aid. I tell thee, Conrade, that neither the powers in Heaven, nor the powers on earth, will long endure the wickedness of this generation. My intelligence is sure—the ground on which our fabric is reared is all undermined, and each addition we make to the structure of our greatness will only sink it the sooner in the day. We must retrace our steps, and show ourselves the faithful champions of the Cross, sacrificing to our calling not our blood and our lives, not alone our lusts and our ease, our comforts, and our natural affections, but as men convinced that many a pleasure which may be lawful to others is forbidden to the avowed soldier of the Temple."

At this moment a squire, clothed in a threadbare garment—for the aspirants after this holy order wore down their noviciate the cast-off garments of the knights—entered the garden, and, bowing profoundly before the Grand Master, stood silent, awaiting his permission to presume to tell his errand.

"Is it not more seemly," said the Grand Master, "this Damian, clothed in the garments of Christian humility, thus appear with reverend silence before his superior than but two days since, when the fond fool was decked in a painted coat, and jangling as pert and as proud a popinjay? Speak, Damian, we permit thee. What is thine errand?"

"A Jew stands without the gate, noble and reverend father," said the squire, "who prays to speak with brother Brian de Bois-Guilbert."

"Thou wert right to give me knowledge of it," said the Grand Master; "in our presence a preceptor is but a common compeer of our order, who may not walk according to his own will, but to that of his Master, even according to the text, ‘In the hearing of the ear he hath ob
It imports us especially to know of this Bois-Guilprrceedings,” said he, turning to his companion.
report speaks him brave and valiant,” said Conrade.
and truly is he so spoken of,” said the Grand Master;
valour only we are not degenerated from our prede-
the heroes of the Cross. But brother Brian came our order a moody and disappointed man, stirred, I
me, to take our vows and to renounce the world, not erity of soul, but as one whom some touch of light tent had driven into penitence. Since then he hath an active and earnest agitator, a murmurer, and a ator, and a leader amongst those who impugn our ity; not considering that the rule is given to the en by the symbol of the staff and the rod—the o support the infirmities of the weak, the rod to cor-he faults of delinquents. Damian,” he continued, the Jew to our presence.”
he squire departed with a profound reverence, and in minutes returned, marshalling in Isaac of York.
ked slave, ushered into the presence of some mighty
could approach his judgment-seat with more pro-
reverence and terror than that with which the Jew ear to the presence of the Grand Master. When he approached within the distance of three yards, Beau-
r made a sign with his staff that he should come no
r. The Jew knelted down on the earth, which he in token of reverence; then rising, stood before the ars, his hands folded on his bosom, his head bowed breast, in all the submission of Oriental slavery.
 Damian,” said the Grand Master, “retire, and have a ready to await our sudden call; and suffer no one to the garden until we shall leave it.” The squire
and retreated. “Jew,” continued the haughty old mark me. It suits not our condition to hold with ong communication, nor do we waste words or time
THE HEARING, etc. See Psalms XVIII. 44.
upon any one. Therefore be brief in thy answers to the questions I shall ask thee, and let thy words be of truth for if thy tongue doubles with me, I will have it torn out of thy misbelieving jaws.”

The Jew was about to reply; but the Grand Master went on:

“Peace, unbeliever! not a word in our presence, save as answer to our questions. What is thy business with my brother Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”

Isaac gasped with terror and uncertainty. To tell the tale might be interpreted into scandalising the order unless he told it, what hope could he have of achieving his daughter’s deliverance? Beaumanoir saw his mortal prehension, and condescended to give him some assurance.

“Fear nothing,” he said, “for thy wretched person, so thou deal est uprightly in this matter. I demand to know from thee thy business with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”

“I am bearer of a letter,” stammered out the Jew, “to please your reverend valour, to that good knight, Prior Aymer of the Abbey of Jorvaulx.”

“Said I not these were evil times, Conrade?” said the Master. “A Cistercian prior sends a letter to a soldiery of the Temple, and can find no more fitting messenger than an unbelieving Jew. Give me the letter.”

The Jew, with trembling hands, undid the folds of his Armenian cap, in which he had deposited the Prior’s letters for the greater security, and was about to approach with hand extended and body crouched, to place it in the reach of his grim interrogator.

“Back, dog!” said the Grand Master: “I touch not believers, save with the sword. Conrade, take thou the letter from the Jew and give it to me.”

Beaumanoir, being thus possessed of the tablet, inspected the outside carefully, and then proceeded with the pack-thread which secured its folds.
ther," said Conrade, interposing, though with much difference, "wilt thou break the seal?"

"And will I not?" said Beaumanoir, with a frown. "Is not written in the forty-second capital, De Lectione Lit-urum,¹ that a Templar shall not receive a letter, no, not from his father, without communicating the same to the Grand Master, and reading it in his presence?"

He then perused the letter in haste, with an expression of surprise and horror; read it over again more slowly;
then holding it out to Conrade with one hand, and slightly nipping it with the other, exclaimed: "Here is goodly stuff for one Christian man to write to another, and both members, and no inconsiderable members, of religious professions! When," said he solemnly, and looking upward,
" wilt Thou come with Thy fanners to purge the thrashing-

Mont-Fitchet took the letter from his superior, and was about to peruse it. "Read it aloud, Conrade," said the Grand Master; "and do thou (to Isaac) attend to the report of it, for we will question thee concerning it."

Conrade read the letter, which was in these words:

Pyner, by divine grace, prior of the Cistercian house of Mary's of Jorvaux, to Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, a Knight of the holy order of the Temple, wisheth health, with the bounties of King Bacchus and of my Lady Venus.
In our present condition, dear brother, we are a active in the hands of certain lawless and godless men, we have not feared to detain our person, and put us to misfortune, and that thou hast escaped with that fair Jew-sorceress whose black eyes have bewitched thee. We heartily rejoiced of thy safety; nevertheless, we pray thee to keep thee on thy guard in the matter of this second Witch

Endor; for we are privately assured that your Great

¹ De Lectione Literarum. "On the reading of letters."
² Wilt Thou, etc. See Luke III. 17.
Master, who careth not a bean for cherry cheeks and eyes, comes from Normandy to diminish your mirth and amend your misdoings. Wherefore we pray you both to beware, and to be found watching, even as the Text hath it, *Inuentur vigilantes.*¹ And the wise Jew her father, Isaac of York, having prayed of me in his behalf, I gave him these, earnestly advising, in a sort entreating, that you do hold the damsel to my seeing he will pay you from his bags as much as many fifty damsels upon safer terms, whereof I trust to have part when we make merry together, as true brothers forgetting the wine-cup. For what saith the text, *Vini laticifolii cor hominis,*² and again, *Rex delectabitur pulcipus dine tua.*³

"Till which merry meeting, we wish you farewell. Given from this den of thieves, about the hour of night.

"Aymer Pr. S. M. Jorvolciencis"

"Postscriptum.—Truly your golden chain hath long abidden with me, and will now sustain, around the neck of an outlaw deer-stealer, the whistle wherewith calleth on his hounds."

"What sayest thou to this, Conrade?" said the Master. "Den of thieves! and a fit residence is a den of thieves for such a prior. No wonder that the hand of God is upon us, and that in the Holy Land we lose place, foot by foot, before the infidels, when we have churchmen as this Aymer. And what meaneth he, by "this second Witch of Endor"?" said he to his companion, something apart.

Conrade was better acquainted, perhaps by practice with the jargon of gallantry than was his superior; and expounded the passage which embarrassed the Grand

² Vini laticifolii cor hominis. See Prov. i. 26.
³ Rex delectabitur pulcipus dine tua. See Prov. ii. 15.
to be a sort of language used by worldly men towards whom they loved par amours; but the explanation not satisfy the bigoted Beaumanoir.

There is more in it than thou dost guess, Conrade; simplicity is no match for this deep abyss of wickedness.

This Rebecca of York was a pupil of that Miriam of whom thou hast heard. Thou shalt hear the Jew own it now.” Then turning to Isaac, he said aloud, “Thy daughter, then, is prisoner with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”

Ay, reverend valorous sir,” stammered poor Isaac, “whatsoever ransom a poor man may pay for her deliverance——”

“Peace!” said the Grand Master. “This thy daughter practised the art of healing, hath she not?”

Ay, gracious sir,” answered the Jew, with more confidence; “and knight and yeoman, squire and vassal, may the goodly gift which Heaven hath assigned to her be a one can testify that she hath recovered them by her when every other human aid hath proved vain; but blessing of the God of Jacob was upon her.”

Beaumanoir turned to Mont-Fitchet with a grim smile. “Brother,” he said, “the deceptions of the devouring lion! Behold the baits with which he fishes for souls. A poor space of earthly life in exchange for eternal blessedness hereafter. Well said our blessed rule, Semper tuiatur leo vorans. Upon the lion! Down with the abbeys!” said he, shaking aloft his mystic abacus, as if defiance of the powers of darkness. “Thy daughter with the cures, I doubt not,” thus he went on to address Jew, “by words and sigils, and periaps, and other mystical mysteries.”

“Nay, reverend and brave knight,” answered Isaac, “in chief measure by a balsam of marvellous virtue.”

“Where had she that secret?” said Beaumanoir.

Para, etc. “The ravening lion is ever to be beaten down.”

Deus et pericups. Souls and charms.
"It was delivered to her," answered Isaac, reluctantly, "by Miriam, a sage matron of our tribe."

"Ah, false Jew!" said the Grand Master; "was it not from that same witch Miriam, the abomination of whose enchantments have been heard of throughout every Christian land?" exclaimed the Grand Master, crossing himself.

"Her body was burnt at a stake, and her ashes were scattered to the four winds; and so be it with me and mine order, if I do not as much to her pupil, and more also! I will teach her to throw spell and incantation over the soldiers of the blessed Temple! There, Damian, spurn this Jew from the gate; shoot him dead if he oppose or turn again. With his daughter we will deal as the Christian law and our own high office warrant."

Poor Isaac was hurried off accordingly, and expelled from the preceptory, all his entreaties, and even his offers unheard and disregarded. He could do no better than return to the house of the Rabbi, and endeavour, through his means, to learn how his daughter was to be disposed of. He had hitherto feared for her honour; he was now to tremble for her life. Meanwhile, the Grand Master ordered to his presence the preceptor of Templestowe.
CHAPTER XXXVI

ay not my art is fraud—all live by seeming.
the beggar begs with it, and the gay courtier
sains land and title, rank and rule, by seeming;
the clergy scorn it not, and the bold soldier
will eke with it his service.—All admit it,
all practice it; and he who is content
with showing what he is shall have small credit
in church, or camp, or state. So wags the world.

Old Play.

Albert Malvoisin, president, or, in the language of the receptor of the establishment of Templestowe, was to that Philip Malvoisin who has been already occa-
mentioned in this history, and was, like that baron, league with Brian de Bois-Guilbert.

amongst dissolute and unprincipled men, of whom the order included but too many, Albert of Temple-right be distinguished; but with this difference from acious Bois-Guilbert, that he knew how to throw vices and his ambition the veil of hypocrisy, and to in his exterior the fanaticism which he internally
l. Had not the arrival of the Grand Master been so dedly sudden, he would have seen nothing at stowe which might have appeared to argue any reof discipline. And, even although surprised, and tain extent detected, Albert Malvoisin listened with pect and apparent contrition to the rebuke of his
, and made such haste to reform the particulars he succeeded, in fine, so well in giving an air of devotion to a family which had been lately devoted and pleasure, that Lucas Beaumanoir began entertain a higher opinion of the preceptor's morals than the first appearance of the establishment had inclined him to adopt.

483

But these favourable sentiments on the part of the Grand Master were greatly shaken by the intelligence that Albert had received within a house of religion the Jewish captive, and, as was to be feared, the paramour of a brother of the order; and when Albert appeared before him he was regarded with unwonted sternness.

"There is in this mansion, dedicated to the purposes of the holy order of the Temple," said the Grand Master, in a severe tone, "a Jewish woman, brought hither by a brother of religion, by your connivance, Sir Preceptor."

Albert Malvoisin was overwhelmed with confusion; for the unfortunate Rebecca had been confined in a remote and secret part of the building, and every precaution used to prevent her residence there from being known. He read in the looks of Beaumanoir ruin to Bois-Guilbert and to himself, unless he should be able to avert the impending storm.

"Why are you mute?" continued the Grand Master.

"Is it permitted to me to reply?" answered the preceptor, in a tone of the deepest humility, although by the question he only meant to gain an instant's space for arranging his ideas.

"Speak, you are permitted," said the Grand Master—"speak, and say, knowest thou the capital of our holy rule? De commilitonibus Templi in sancta civitate, qui cum errimis mulieribus versantur, propter oblectationem vobis?"1

"Surely, most reverend father," answered the preceptor, "I have not risen to this office in the order, being ignorant of one of its most important prohibitions."

"How comes it, then, I demand of thee once more, that thou hast suffered a brother to bring a paramour, and that

1 De Commilitonibus, etc. The edict which he quotes. In connexion with women of light character. [Scott.]
a Jewish sorceress, into this holy place, to the pollution thereof?"

jewish sorceress!” echoed Albert Malvoisin, “good brother! a Jewish sorceress,” said the Grand Massey. “I have said it. Darest thou deny that this daughter of that wretched usurer Isaac of the pupil of the foul witch Miriam, is now—be thought or spoken!—lodged within this thy twisdom, reverend father,” answered the preceptrolled away the darkness from my understanding.

I wonder that so good a knight as Brian de Boisseemed so fondly besotted on the charms of this thom I received into this house merely to place a xt their growing intimacy, which else might have ented at the expense of the fall of our valiant and brother.”
onthing, then, as yet passed betwixt them in his vow?” demanded the Grand Master.
art! under this roof?” said the preceptor, crossing “St. Magdalene and the ten thousand virgins for-
If I have sinned in receiving her here, it was in ought that I might thus break off our brother’s devotion to this Jewess, which seemed to me so unnatural, that I could not but ascribe it to some insanity, more to be cured by pity than reproof.
your reverend wisdom hath discovered this Jew-3 to be a sorceress, perchance it may account fully amoured folly.”
both!—it doth!” said Beaumanoir. “See, brother
the peril of yielding to the first devices and blanof Satan! We look upon woman only to gratify the eye, and to take pleasure in what men call her nd the Ancient Enemy, the devouring lion, obtains n abandoned woman.
power over us, to complete, by talisman and spell, a which was begun by idleness and folly. It may be that brother Bois-Guilbert does in this matter deserve piti than severe chastisement, rather the support of the
than the strokes of the rod; and that our admonition prayers may turn him from his folly, and restore him to brethren."

"It were deep pity," said Conrade Mont-Fitchet, "to the order one of its best lances, when the holy commu
most requires the aid of its sons. Three hundred Sa thath this Brian de Bois-Guilbert slain with his own ha

"The blood of these accursed dogs," said the G Master, "shall be a sweet and acceptable offering to saints and angels whom they despise and blaspheme, with their aid will we counteract the spells and charms which our brother is entwined as in a net. He shall the bands of this Delilah as Samson burst the two cords with which the Philistines had bound him, and slaughter the infidels, even heaps upon heaps. But cerning this foul witch, who hath flung her enchant over a brother of the Holy Temple, assuredly she shall the death."

"But the laws of England——" said the preceptor, though delighted that the Grand Master’s resentment, fortunately averted from himself and Bois-Guilbert, taken another direction, began now to fear he was car
it too far.

"The laws of England," interrupted Beaumanoir, mit and enjoin each judge to execute justice within his jurisdiction. The most petty baron may arrest, try, condemn a witch found within his own domain. And that power be denied to the Grand Master of the Te within a preceptory of his order? No! we will judge, condemn. The witch shall be taken out of the land,
the wickedness thereof shall be forgiven. Prep castle hall for the trial of the sorceress."
Albert Malvoisin bowed and retired, not to give directions for preparing the hall, but to seek out Brian de Bois-Hert, and communicate to him how matters were likely to terminate. It was not long ere he found him, foaming with indignation at a repulse he had sustained from a fair Jewess. “The unthinking,” he said—“the un-senseful, to scorn him who, amidst blood and flames, would even have saved her life at the risk of his own! By Heaven, Malin! I abode until roof and rafters crackled and crashed and me. I was the butt of a hundred arrows; they flailed on mine armour like hailstones against a latticed window, and the only use I made of my shield was for her protection. This did I endure for her, and now the self-ed girl upbraids me that I did not leave her to perish, refuses me not only the slightest proof of gratitude, but in the most distant hope that ever she will be brought to her. The devil, that possessed her race with ob-cenity, has concentrated its full force in her single person!”
“Thedevil,” said the preceptor, “I think, possessed you.
How oft have I preached to you caution, if not concurrence? Did I not tell you that there were enough willing Christian damsels to be met with, who would think it sin to lose so brave a knight le don d’amourex merci, and you must needs anchor your affection on a wilful, obstinate Jewese? By the mass, I think old Lucas Beaumanoir guesses
it, when he maintains she hath cast a spell over you.” “Are these your precautions, Malvoisin? Hast thou suf-fed the dotard to learn that Rebecca is in the preceptory?”
“How could I help it?” said the preceptor. “I neglected a thing that could keep secret your mystery; but it is be-ed, and whether by the devil or no, the devil only can

But I have turned the matter as I could; you are safe now, renounce Rebecca. You are pitied—the victim of

DON D’AMOUREX MERCI. “The generous gift of love.”
magical delusion. She is a sorceress, and must suffer such."

"She shall not, by Heaven!" said Bois-Guilbert.

"By Heaven, she must and will!" said Malvois.

"Neither you nor any one else can save her. Lucas Bea-manoir hath settled that the death of a Jewess will be sin-offering sufficient to atone for all the amorous in-digences of the Knights Templars; and thou knowest he hath both the power and will to execute so reasonable and per-apurpose."

"Will future ages believe that such stupid bigotry existed!" said Bois-Guilbert, striding up and down the apartment.

"What they may believe, I know not," said Malvois calmly; "but I know well, that in this our day clergy and laymen, take ninety-nine to the hundred, will cry 'Amen'
to the Grand Master's sentence."

"I have it," said Bois-Guilbert. "Albert, thou art my friend. Thou must connive at her escape, Malvoisin, and will transport her to some place of greater security and secrecy."

"I cannot, if I would," replied the preceptor; "the ma-sion is filled with the attendants of the Grand Master, and others who are devoted to him. And, to be frank with you, brother, I would not embark with you in this matter, even
I could hope to bring my bark to haven. I have rathearth enough already for your sake. I have no mind to encounter a sentence of degradation, or even to lose my precep-tory, for the sake of a painted piece of Jewish flesh and blood.
And you, if you will be guided by my counsel, will give up the wild-goose chase, and fly your hawk at some other game.
Think, Bois-Guilbert; thy present rank, thy future honours all depend on thy place in the order. Shouldst thou slight perversely to thy passion for this Rebecca, thou wilt lose Beaumanoir the power of expelling thee, and he will neglect it. He is jealous of the truncheon which he w
s trembling gripe, and he knows thou stretchest thy hand towards it. Doubt not he will ruin thee, if thou dost him a pretext so fair as thy protection of a Jewishress. Give him his scope in this matter, for thou canst control him. When the staff is in thine own firm grasp, mayest caress the daughters of Judah, or burn them, as best suit thine own humour.”

Malvoisin,” said Bois-Guilbert, “thou art a cold-blood—”

Friend,” said the preceptor, hastening to fill up the blank, in which Bois-Guilbert would probably have placed a profane word—“a cold-blooded friend I am, and therefore unfit to give thee advice. I tell thee once more, that I canst not save Rebecca. I tell thee once more, thou must perish with her. Go hie thee to the Grand Master, throw thyself at his feet and tell him—”

Not at his feet, by Heaven! but to the dotard’s very door, will I say—”

Say to him, then, to his beard,” continued Malvoisin, “that you love this captive Jewess to distraction; the more thou dost enlarge on thy passion, the greater be his haste to end it by the death of the fair ens- tress; while thou, taken in flagrant delict by the very act of a crime contrary to thine oath, canst hope no aid from thy brethren, and must exchange all thy brilliant visions of ambition and power, to lift perhaps a mercenary spear in the petty quarrels between Flanders and Bur-

Thou speakest the truth, Malvoisin,” said Brian de -Guilbert, after a moment’s reflection. “I will give the y bigot no advantage over me; and for Rebecca, she not merited at my hand that I should expose rank and sur for her sake. I will cast her off; yes, I will leave to her fate, unless—”

Quality not thy wise and necessary resolution,” said
Malvoisin; "women are but the toys which amuse our lighter hours; ambition is the serious business of life. Perish a thousand such frail baubles as this Jewess, before thy manly step pause in the brilliant career that lies stretched before thee! For the present we part, nor must we be seen to hold close conversation; I must order the hall for his judgment seat."

"What!" said Bois-Guilbert, "so soon?"

"Ay," replied the preceptor, "trial moves rapidly on when the judge has determined the sentence beforehand."

"Rebecca," said Bois-Guilbert, when he was left alone, "thou art like to cost me dear. Why cannot I abandon thee to thy fate, as this calm hypocrite recommends? One effort will I make to save thee; but beware of ingratitude! for, if I am again repulsed, my vengeance shall equal my love. The life and honour of Bois-Guilbert must not be hazarded, where contempt and reproaches are his only reward."

The preceptor had hardly given the necessary order, when he was joined by Conrade Mont-Fitchet, who acquainted him with the Grand Master's resolution to bring the Jewess to instant trial for sorcery.

"It is surely a dream," said the preceptor; "we have many Jewish physicians, and we call them not wizards, though they work wonderful cures."

"The Grand Master thinks otherwise," said Mont-Fitchet; "and, Albert, I will be upright with thee: wizard or not, it were better that this miserable damsel die than that Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be lost to the order, or the order divided by internal dissension. Thou knowest his high rank, his fame in arms; thou knowest the zeal with which many of our brethren regard him; but all this will not avail him with our Grand Master, should he consider Brian as the accomplice, not the victim, of this Jewess. Were the souls of the twelve tribes in her single body, it were better she suffered alone than that Bois-Guilbert were partner in her destruction."
I have been working him even now to abandon her,” Malvoisin; “but still, are there grounds enough to con-this Rebecca for sorcery? Will not the Grand Master urge his mind when he sees that the proofs are so weak?”
They must be strengthened, Albert,” replied Mont-et—“they must be strengthened. Dost thou under-me?”
I do,” said the preceptor, “nor do I scruple to do aught advancement of the order; but there is little time to engines fitting.”
Malvoisin, they must be found,” said Conrade; “well advantage both the order and thee. This Temple is a poor preceptory; that of Maison-Dieu is worth its value. Thou knowest my interest with our old find those who can carry this matter through, and art preceptor of Maison-Dieu in the fertile Kent.
sayst thou?”
There is,” replied Malvoisin, “among those who came r with Bois-Guilbert, two fellows whom I well know;
nts they were to my brother Philip de Malvoisin, and ed from his service to that of Front-de-Bœuf. It may know something of the witcheries of this woman.”
Away, seek them out instantly; and hark thee, if a ut or two will sharpen their memory, let them not be
They would swear the mother that bore them a sorcer-
 a zechin,” said the preceptor.
Away, then,” said Mont-Fitchet; “at noon the affair proceed. I have not seen our senior in such earnest ration since he condemned to the stake Hamet Alfagi, ert who relapsed to the Moslem faith.”
he ponderous castle-bell had tolled the point of noon, Rebecca heard a trampling of feet upon the private which led to her place of confinement. The noise ounced the arrival of several persons, and the circum-Maison-Dieu. The name of the preceptory means “House of God.”
stance rather gave her joy; for she was more afraid of the solitary visits of the fierce and passionate Bois-Guilbert than of any evil that could befall her besides. The door of the chamber was unlocked, and Conrade and the preceptor Malvoisin entered, attended by four warders clothed in black, and bearing halberds.

"Daughter of an accursed race!" said the preceptor, "arise and follow us."

"Whither," said Rebecca, "and for what purpose?"

"Damsel," answered Conrade, "it is not for thee to question, but to obey. Nevertheless, be it known to thee, thou art to be brought before the tribunal of the Grand Master of our holy order, there to answer for thy offences."

"May the God of Abraham be praised!" said Rebecca, folding her hands devoutly; "the name of a judge, that is an enemy to my people, is to me as the name of a protector. Most willingly do I follow thee; permit me only to wrap a veil around my head."

They descended the stair with slow and solemn steps, traversed a long gallery, and, by a pair of folding-doors placed at the end, entered the great hall in which the Grand Master had for the time established his court of justice.

The lower part of this ample apartment was filled with squires and yeomen, who made way, not without some difficulty, for Rebecca, attended by the preceptor and Master Fitchet, and followed by the guard of halberdistes, to make forward to the seat appointed for her. As she passed through the crowd, her arms folded and her head depressed, a scrap of paper was thrust into her hand, which she received almost unconsciously, and continued to hold while examining its contents. The assurance that she possessed some friend in this awful assembly gave her courage to look around, and to mark into whose presence she had been conducted. She gazed, accordingly, upon the scene, which shall endeavour to describe in the next chapter.
CHAPTER XXXVII

tern was the law which bade its vot'ries leave in human woes with human hearts to grieve;
tern was the law, which at the winning wile
of frank and harmless mirth forbade to smile;
ut stern still, when high the iron rod
of tyrant power she shook, and call'd that power of God.

The Middle Ages.

...a tribunal, erected for the trial of the innocent and see Rebecca, occupied the dais or elevated part of the end of the great hall—a platform which we have be described as the place of honour, destined to be ed by the most distinguished inhabitants or guests of ent mansion.

...an elevated seat, directly before the accused, sat the Master of the Temple, in full and ample robes of white, holding in his hand the mystic staff which be symbol of the order. At his feet was placed a occupied by two scribes, chaplains of the order, whose was to reduce to formal record the proceedings of ...The black dresses, bare scalps, and demure looks the churchmen formed a strong contrast to the warlike ance of the knights who attended, either as residing preceptory or as come thither to attend upon their Master. The preceptors, of whom there were four, occupied seats lower in height and somewhat drawn behind that of their superior; and the knights who no such rank in the order were placed on benches wer, and preserving the same distance from the pre-as these from the Grand Master. Behind them, but on the dais or elevated portion of the hall, stood the of the order, in white dresses of an inferior quality.
The whole assembly wore an aspect of the most profound gravity; and in the faces of the knights might be perceived traces of military daring, united with the solemn carriage becoming men of a religious profession, and which, in the presence of their Grand Master, failed not to sit upon every brow.

The remaining and lower part of the hall was filled with guards, holding partizans, and with other attendants whom curiosity had drawn thither to see at once a Grand Master and a Jewish sorceress. By far the greater part of those inferior persons were, in one rank or other, connected with the order, and were accordingly distinguished by their black dresses. But peasants from the neighbouring country were not refused admittance; for it was the pride of Beaumanoir to render the edifying spectacle of the justice which he administered as public as possible. His large blue eyes seemed to expand as he gazed around the assembly, and his countenance appeared elated by the conscious dignity and imaginary merit of the part which he was about to perform. A psalm, which he himself accompanied with a deep mellow voice, which age had not deprived of its powers, commenced the proceedings of the day; and the solemn sounds, Venite, exultemus Domino, so often sung by the Templars before engaging with earthly adversaries, was judged by Laroche most appropriate to introduce the approaching triumph, for such he deemed it, over the powers of darkness. The deep prolonged notes, raised by a hundred masculine voices accustomed to combine in the choral chant, arose to the vaulted roof of the hall, and rolled on amongst its arches with the pleasing yet solemn sound of the rushing of mighty waters.

When the sounds ceased, the Grand Master glanced his eye slowly around the circle, and observed that the seat of one of the preceptors was vacant. Brian de Bois-Guilbert, by whom it had been occupied, had left his place, and was

1 Venite, etc. "O come, let us sing unto the Lord." See Psalm XCVII. 1.
now standing near the extreme corner of one of the benches occupied by the knights companions of the Temple, one and extending his long mantle, so as in some degree to hide his face; while the other held his cross-handled sword, with the point of which, sheathed as it was, he was slowly drawing lines upon the oaken floor.

"Unhappy man!" said the Grand Master, after favouring him with a glance of compassion. "Thou seest, Conrade, how this holy work distresses him. To this can the light look of woman, aided by the Prince of the Powers of this world, bring a valiant and worthy knight! Seest thou he cannot look upon us; he cannot look upon her; and who knows by what impulse from his tormentor his hand forms these cabalistic lines upon the floor? It may be our life and safety are thus aimed at; but we spit at and defy the foul enemy. Semper Leo percultatur!"

This was communicated apart to his confidential fol-ower, Conrade Mont-Fitchet. The Grand Master then tused his voice and addressed the assembly.

"Reverend and valiant men, knights, preceptors, and companions of this holy order, my brethren and my children! you also, well-born and pious esquires, who aspire to bear this Holy Cross! and you also, Christian brethren, of every degree!—be it known to you, that it is not defect of power in us which hath occasioned the assembling of this congregation; for, however unworthy in our person, yet to this is committed, with this baton, full power to judge and try all that regards the weal of this our holy order. Holy St. Bernard, in the rule of our knightly and religious procession, hath said, in the fifty-ninth capital, that he would not that brethren be called together in council, save at the will and command of the Master; leaving it free to us, as to those more worthy fathers who have preceded us in this our

1 Semper Leo, etc. " Ever let the lion be beaten down."
2 Capital. The reader is again referred to the Rules of the Poor Military Brotherhood of the Temple, which occur in the Works of St. Bernard. L.
[Scott.]
office, to judge as well of the occasion as of the time and place in which a chapter of the whole order, or of any part thereof, may be convoked. Also, in all such chapters, it is our duty to hear the advice of our brethren, and to proceed according to our own pleasure. But when the raging wolf hath made an inroad upon the flock, and carried off one member thereof, it is the duty of the kind shepherd to call his comrades together, that with bows and slings they may quell the invader, according to our well-known rule, that the lion is ever to be beaten down. We have therefore summoned to our presence a Jewish woman, by name Rebecca, daughter of Isaac of York—a woman infamous for sortileges and for witcheries; whereby she hath maddened the blood, and besotted the brain, not of a churl, but of a knight; not of a secular knight, but of one devoted to the service of the Holy Temple; not of a knight companion, but of a preceptor of our order, first in honour as in place. Our brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, is well known to ourselves and to all degrees who now hear me, as a true and zealous champion of the Cross, by whose arm many deeds of valor have been wrought in the Holy Land, and the holy place purified from pollution by the blood of those infidels who defiled them. Neither have our brother’s sagacity and prudence been less in repute among his brethren than his valour and discipline; insomuch that knights, both in eastern and western lands, have named De Bois-Guilbert as one who may well be put in nomination as successor to this baizeam when it shall please Heaven to release us from the toil of bearing it. If we were told that such a man, so honoured and so honourable, suddenly casting away regard for his character, his vows, his brethren, and his prospects, had associated to himself a Jewish damsel, wandered in this lewd company through solitary places, defended her person in preference to his own, and, finally, was so utterly blinded and besotted by his folly, as to bring her even to one of our

1 Sortileges. Divination by drawing lots. Sorcery.

2

3

4
a preceptories, what should we say but that the noble right was possessed by some evil demon, or influenced by the wicked spell? If we could suppose it otherwise, think rank, valour, high repute, or any earthly consideration, could prevent us from visiting him with punishment, that evil thing might be removed, even according to the text, "ferte malum ex vobis." For various and heinous are the acts of transgression against the rule of our blessed order his lamentable history. 1st, He hath walked according to his proper will, contrary to capital 33, Quod nullus juxta priam voluntatem incedat. 2d, He hath held communi-tion with an excommunicated person, capital 57, Ut nones non participent cum excommunicatis, and therefore in a portion in Anathema Maranatha. 3d, He hath con-sorted with strange women, contrary to the capital, Ut nones non conversantur cum extraneis mulieribus. 4th, he hath not avoided, nay, he hath, it is to be feared, whened, the kiss of woman, by which, saith the last rule of renowned order, Ut fugiantur oscula, the soldiers of the priest are brought into a snare. For which heinous and multiplied guilt, Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be cut off and cast out from our congregation, were he the right hand right eye thereof."

He paused. A low murmur went through the assembly.
one of the younger part, who had been inclined to smile at statute, De osculis fugiendis, became now grave enough, and anxiously waited what the Grand Master was next to pose.

"Such," he said, "and so great should indeed be the pun-

AUFERTE, etc. "Put away the evil from you." See Deuteronomy XIII. 5.
QUOD NULLUS, etc. "That no one shall walk according to his own will."
UT FRATRES, etc. "That the brethren shall hold no intercourse with the excommunicated."
UT FRATRES, etc. "That the brethren should not hold intercourse with the women."
UT FUGIANTUR, etc. "That kissing should be shunned."
DE OSCULIS, etc. "Of the shunning of kisses."
ishment of a Knight Templar who wilfully offended at the rules of his order in such weighty points. But means of charms and of spells, Satan had obtained minion over the knight, perchance because he cast his too lightly upon a damsel's beauty, we are then lament more than chastise his backsliding; and, imposing only such penance as may purify him from his iniquity, are to turn the full edge of our indignation upon the cursed instrument, which had so well-nigh occasioned utter falling away. Stand forth, therefore, and bea- ness, ye who have witnessed these unhappy doings, may judge of the sum and bearing thereof; and whether our justice may be satisfied with the punishment this infidel woman, or if we must go on, with a blest heart, to the further proceeding against our brother.*

Several witnesses were called upon to prove the ri- which Bois-Guilbert exposed himself in endeavouring to save Rebecca from the blazing castle, and his neglect of personal defence in attending to her safety. The men these details with the exaggerations common to minds which have been strongly excited by any remark- event, and their natural disposition to the marvellous, greatly increased by the satisfaction which their eri- seemed to afford to the eminent person for whose infor- mation it had been delivered. Thus the dangers which Guilbert surmounted, in themselves sufficiently great, came portentous in their narrative. The devotion of knight to Rebecca’s defence was exaggerated beyond bounds not only of discretion, but even of the most firm excess of chivalrous zeal; and his deference to what she even although her language was often severe and upbraiding, was painted as carried to an excess which, in a man his haughty temper, seemed almost preternatural.

The preceptor of Templestowe was then called on to describe the manner in which Bois-Guilbert and the others arrived at the preceptory. The evidence of Mauvaise fully guarded. But while he apparently studied to the feelings of Bois-Guilbert, he threw in, from time time, such hints as seemed to infer that he laboured for some temporary alienation of mind, so deeply did he feel to be enamoured of the damsel whom he brought g with him. With sighs of penitence, the preceptor ed his own contrition for having admitted Rebecca and over within the walls of the preceptory. "But my deve," he concluded, "has been made in my confession to most reverend father the Grand Master; he knows my ives were not evil, though my conduct may have been ular. Joyfully will I submit to any penance he shall me."
Thou hast spoken well, brother Albert," said Beau-ir; "thy motives were good, since thou didst judge it to arrest thine erring brother in his career of precipi-folly. But thy conduct was wrong; as he that would a runaway steed, and seizing by the stirrup instead of ridle, receiveth injury himself, instead of accomplishing his purpose. Thirteen paternosters are assigned by our founder for matins, and nine for vespers; be those ces doubled by thee. Thrice a-week are Templars pered the use of flesh; but do thou keep fast for all the ays. This do for six weeks to come, and thy penis accomplished."

With a hypocritical look of the deepest submission, the ceptor of Templestowe bowed to the ground before his rior, and resumed his seat.
Were it not well, brethren," said the Grand Master,
it we examine something into the former life and con-tion of this woman, specially that we may discover
her she be one likely to use magical charms and spells, e the truths which we have heard may well incline us to ose that in this unhappy course our erring brother has acted upon by some infernal enticement and dem-
Herman of Goodalricke was the fourth preceptor present; the other three were Conrade, Malvoisin, and Bois-Guilbert himself. Herman was an ancient warrior, whose face was marked with scars inflicted by the sabre of the Moslemah, and had great rank and consideration among his brethren. He arose and bowed to the Grand Master, who instantly granted him license of speech. "I would crave to know, most reverend father, of our valiant brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, what he says to these wondrous accusations and with what eye he himself now regards his unhappy intercourse with this Jewish maiden?"

"Brian de Bois-Guilbert," said the Grand Master, "thou hearest the question which our brother of Goodalricke desirest thou shouldst answer. I command thee to reply to him."

Bois-Guilbert turned his head towards the Grand Master when thus addressed, and remained silent.

"He is possessed by a dumb devil," said the Grand Master. "Avoid thee, Sathanas! Speak, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, I conjure thee, by this symbol of our holy order."

Bois-Guilbert made an effort to suppress his rising exost and indignation, the expression of which, he was well aware, would have little availed him. "Brian de Bois-Guilbert," he answered, "replies not, most reverend father, to such wild and vague charges. If his honour be impeached, he will defend it with his body, and with that sword which he often fought for Christendom."

"We forgive thee, brother Brian," said the Grand Master; "though that thou hast boasted thy warlike achievements before us is a glorifying of thine own deeds, and cometh of the Enemy, who tempteth us to exalt our own worship. But thou hast our pardon, judging thou speakest less of thine own suggestion than from the impulse of him whom, by Heaven's leave, we will quell and drive forth from our assembly." A glance of disdain flashed from the fierce eyes of Bois-Guilbert, but he made no reply. "And sued the Grand Master, "since our brother of be's question has been thus imperfectly answered, our quest, brethren, and with our patron's assist-ill search to the bottom this mystery of iniquity.
who have aught to witness of the life and converhis Jewish woman stand forth before us."
was a bustle in the lower part of the hall, and Grand Master inquired the reason, it was replied, in the crowd a bedridden man, whom the prisoner
ed to the perfect use of his limbs, by a miraculous or peasant, a Saxon by birth, was dragged fore bar, terrified at the penal consequences which have incurred by the guilt of having been cured of y a Jewish damsel. Perfectly cured he certainly or he supported himself forward on crutches to ence. Most unwilling was his testimony, and many tears; but he admitted that two years residing at York, he was suddenly afflicted with se, while labouring for Isaac the rich Jew, in his f a joiner; that he had been unable to stir from still the remedies applied by Rebecca's directions, ally a warming and spicy-smelling balsam, had in ee restored him to the use of his limbs. More-id, she had given him a pot of that precious ointished him with a piece of money withal, to the house of his father, near to Templestowe.
ple your gracious reverence," said the man, think the damsel meant harm by me, though she ll hap to be a Jewess; for even when I used her said the pater and the creed, and it never operless kindly."
, slave," said the Grand Master, "and begone!
ts brutes like thee to be tampering and trinketing cures, and to be giving your labour to the sons
f. I tell thee, the fiend can impose diseases for the very purpose of removing them, in order to bring into credit some diabolical fashion of cure. Hast thou that unguent of which thou speakest?"

The peasant, fumbling in his bosom with a trembling hand, produced a small box, bearing some Hebrew characters on the lid, which was, with most of the audience, a sure proof that the devil had stood apothecary. Beaumanoir, after crossing himself, took the box into his hand, and learned in most of the Eastern tongues, read with ease the motto on the lid: "The Lion of the Tribe of Judah hath conquered." "Strange powers of Sathanas," said he, "which can convert Scripture into blasphemy, mingling poison with our necessary food! Is there no leech here who can tell us the ingredients of this mystic unguent?"

Two mediciners, as they called themselves, the one a monk, the other a barber, appeared, and avouched they knew nothing of the materials, excepting that they savoured of myrrh and camphire, which they took to be Oriental herbs. But with the true professional hatred to a successful practitioner of their art, they insinuated that, since the medicine was beyond their own knowledge, it must necessarily have been compounded from an unlawful and magical pharmacopoeia; since they themselves, though no conjurors, fully understood every branch of their art, so far as it might be exercised with the good faith of a Christian. When this medical research was ended, the Saxon peasant desired humbly to have back the medicine which he had found so salutary; but the Grand Master frowned severely at the request. "What is thy name, fellow?" said he to the cripple.

"Higg, the son of Snell," answered the peasant.

"Then, Higg, son of Snell," said the Grand Master, "I tell thee, it is better to be bedridden than to accept the benefit of unbelievers' medicine that thou mayest arise and walk; better to despoin infidels of their treasure by the way, than to accept of them benevolent gifts, or do them service for wages. Go thou, and do as I have said."

Alack," said the peasant, "an it shall not displease your reverence, the lesson comes too late for me, for I am but a red man; but I will tell my two brethren, who serve the Rabbi Nathan Ben Samuel,¹ that your mastership is more lawful to rob him than to render him faith-service."

Out with the prating villain!" said Beaumanoir, who was not prepared to refute this practical application of his moral maxim.

Trigg, the son of Snell, withdrew into the crowd, but, interested in the fate of his benefactress, lingered until he learned her doom, even at the risk of again encountering the frown of that severe judge, the terror of which chilled his very heart within him.

At this period of the trial, the Grand Master commanded Rebecca to unveil herself. Opening her lips for the first time, she replied patiently, but with dignity, that it was not the wont of the daughters of her people to uncover their faces when alone in an assembly of strangers." The sweet tones of her voice, and the softness of her reply, impressed on the audience a sentiment of pity and sympathy. But Beaumanoir, in whose mind the suggestion of each feeling of humanity which could interfere with his imagined duty was a virtue of itself, repeated his demands that his victim should be unveiled. The judges were about to remove her veil accordingly, when he stood up before the Grand Master, and said, "Nay, but the love of your own daughters—alas," she said, recollecting herself, "ye have no daughters!—yet for the remembrance of your mothers, for the love of your sisters, and of old decency, let me not be thus handled in your presence; it suits not a maiden to be disrobed by such rude hands. I will obey you," she added, with an expression of patient sorrow in her voice, which had almost moved the heart of Beaumanoir himself; "ye are elders among the people, and at your command I will show the features of our ill-fated maiden."

¹: See the beginning of Chap. XXXV.

She withdrew her veil, and looked on them with tenderness in which bashfulness contended with dignity. A murmur of surprise, exceeding beauty excited a murmur of surprise, younger knights told each other with their eyes, in correspondence, that Brian’s best apology was in the presence of her real charms, rather than of her imaginary virtues.

But Higg, the son of Snell, felt most deeply the effects produced by the sight of the countenance of his benefactor. "Let me go forth," he said to the warders at the entrance to the hall—"let me go forth! To look at her again! For I have had a share in murdering her."

"Peace, poor man," said Rebecca, when she heard these exclamations; "thou hast done me no harm by speaking the truth; thou canst not aid me by thy complaints or supplications. Peace, I pray thee; go home and save thyself."

Higg was about to be thrust out by the complicity of the warders, who were apprehensive lest his clamor should draw upon them reprehension, and upon himself punishment. But he promised to be silent, and was permitted to remain. The two men-at-arms, with whom Albert Malvoisin had not failed to communicate the import of their testimony, were now called to the bar. Though both were hardened and inflexible villains, their sight of the captive maiden, as well as her Excellency's, first appeared to stagger them; but an expressive look from the preceptor of Templestowe restored them to their dogged composure; and they delivered, with a spirit which would have seemed suspicious to more indifferent judges, circumstances either altogether fictitious or certainly and natural in themselves, but rendered pregnant with suspicion by the exaggerated manner in which they were told and the sinister commentary which the witnesses" facts. The circumstances of their evidence would have, in modern days, divided into two classes—those which were immaterial, and those which were actually and physically impossible. But both were, in those ignorant and superstitious times, easily credited as proofs of guilt. The story set forth that Rebecca was heard to mutter to herself in an unknown tongue; that the songs she sung by fits and fits were of a strangely sweet sound, which made the ears of the hearer tingle and his heart throb; that she spoke at times to herself, and seemed to look upward for a reply; that her garments were of a strange and mystic form, unlike those of women of good repute; that she had rings imbedded with cabalistical devices, and that strange characters were brodered on her veil. All these circumstances, natural and so trivial, were gravely listened to as proofs, at least as affording strong suspicions, that Rebecca had awful correspondence with mystical powers.

But there was less equivocal testimony, which the credulity of the assembly, or of the greater part, greedily swallowed, however incredible. One of the soldiers had seen a cure upon a wounded man brought with them to the castle of Torquilstone. "She did," he said, "make signs upon the wound, and repeated certain mystic words, which he blessed God he understood not, when the iron head of a square cross-bow bolt disengaged itself from the wound, the bleeding was stanchèd, the wound closed, and the dying man was, within the quarter of an hour, walking upon the ramparts, and assisting within managing a mangonel, or machine for hurling stones." This legend was probably founded upon the fact that Rebecca had attended on the wounded Ivanhoe when he was brought to the castle of Torquilstone. But it was the more difficult to dispute the accuracy of the witness, as, in order to prove real evidence in support of his verbal testimony, he produced from his pouch the very bolt-head which, according to his story, had been miraculously extracted from the wound; and as the iron weighed a full ounce, it completely confirmed the tale, however marvellous.

His comrade had been a witness from a neighbouring battlement of the scene betwixt Rebecca and Bois-Guilbert, when she was upon the point of precipitating herself from the top of the tower. Not to be behind his companion, this fellow stated that he had seen Rebecca perch herself upon the parapet of the turret, and there take the form of a milk-white swan, under which appearance she flitted three times round the castle of Torquilstone; then again settle on the turret, and once more assume the female form.

Less than one-half of this weighty evidence would have been sufficient to convict any old woman, poor and ugly, even though she had not been a Jewess. United with that fatal circumstance, the body of proof was too weighty for Rebecca’s youth, though combined with the most exquisite beauty.

The Grand Master had collected the suffrages, and now in a solemn tone demanded of Rebecca what she had to say against the sentence of condemnation which he was about to pronounce.

“To invoke your pity,” said the lovely Jewess, with a voice somewhat tremulous with emotion, “would, I am aware, be as useless as I should hold it mean. To state that to relieve the sick and wounded of another religion cannot be displeasing to the acknowledged Founder of both our faiths, were also unavailing; to plead, that many things which these men—whom may Heaven pardon!—have spoken against me are impossible, would avail me but little, since you believe in their possibility; and still less would it advantage me to explain that the peculiarities of my dress, language, and manners are those of my people—I had well-nigh said of my country, but, alas! we have no country. Nor will I even vindicate myself at the expense of my oppressor, who stands there listening to the fictions and surmises which seem to convert the tyrant into the God be judge between him and me! but rather I submit to ten such deaths as your pleasure may once against me than listen to the suit which that man has urged upon me—friendless, defenseless, and soner. But he is of your own faith, and his lightest once would weigh down the most solemn protestations distressed Jewess. I will not therefore return to the charge brought against me; but to himself—Brian de Bois-Guilbert, to thyself I appeal, whether accusations are not false? as monstrous and calumni— they are deadly?"

there was a pause; all eyes turned to Brian de Bois-
ert. He was silent.

"speak," she said, "if thou art a man; if thou art a man, speak! I conjure thee, by the habit which thou wear—by the name thou dost inherit—by the knighthou dost vaunt—by the honour of thy mother—by and the bones of thy father—I conjure thee to the these things true?"

answer her, brother," said the Grand Master, "if the with whom thou dost wrestle will give thee power."

fact, Bois-Guilbert seemed agitated by contending us, which almost convulsed his features, and it was constrained voice that at last he replied, looking to a: "The scroll!—the scroll!"

"y," said Beaumanoir, "this is indeed testimony!
victim of her witcheries can only name the fatal scroll, ll inscribed on which is, doubtless, the cause of his"

Rebecca put another interpretation on the words and as it were from Bois-Guilbert, and glancing her on the slip of parchment which she continued to hold hand, she read written thereupon in the Arabian her, "Demand a champion!" The murmuring comy which ran through the assembly at the strange of Bois-Guilbert gave Rebecca leisure to examine and instantly to destroy the scroll unobserved. When whisper had ceased, the Grand Master spoke.

"Rebecca, thou canst derive no benefit from the evidence of this unhappy knight, for whom, as we well receive, the Enemy is yet too powerful. Hast thou else to say?"

"There is yet one chance of life left to me," said Rebecca, "even by your own fierce laws. Life has been miserable—miserable, at least, of late—but I will not cast away the gift of God while He affords me the means of defending it. I deny this charge; I maintain my innocence, and declare the falsehood of this accusation. I challenge privilege of trial by combat, and will appear by my champion."

"And who, Rebecca," replied the Grand Master, "lay lance in rest for a sorceress? who will be the champion of a Jewess?"

"God will raise me up a champion," said Rebecca, "cannot be that in merry England, the hospitable, the generous, the free, where so many are ready to peril their lives for honour, there will not be found one to fight for justice. But it is enough that I challenge the trial by combat, that lies my gage."

She took her embroidered glove from her hand, and flung it down before the Grand Master, with an air mingled simplicity and dignity which excited universal surprise and admiration.
CHAPTER XXXVIII

There I throw my gage,
To prove it on thee to the extremest point
Of martial daring.

Richard II.

Even Lucas Beaumanoir himself was affected by the en and appearance of Rebecca. He was not originally cruel or even a severe man; but with passions by nature old, and with a high, though mistaken, sense of duty, his heart had been gradually hardened by the ascetic life which pursued, the supreme power which he enjoyed, and the s opposed necessity of subduing infidelity and eradicating resy which he conceived peculiarly incumbent on him.
is features relaxed in their usual severity as he gazed upon the beautiful creature before him, alone, unfriended, and defending herself with so much spirit and courage. He possed himself twice, as doubting whence arose the unlimited softening of a heart which on such occasions used resemble in hardness the steel of his sword. At length spoke.

"Damsel," he said, "if the pity I feel for thee arise from a practice thine evil arts have made on me, great is thy
It. But I rather judge it the kinder feelings of nature, ich grieves that so goodly a form should be a vessel of edition. Repent, my daughter, confess thy witchcrafts, thee from thine evil faith, embrace this holy emblem, all shall yet be well with thee here and hereafter. In the sisterhood of the strictest order shalt thou have time prayer and fitting penance, and that repentance not to repeated of. This do and live: what has the law of ses done for thee that thou shouldst die for it?"
"It was the law of my fathers," said Rebecca; "it was delivered in thunders and in storms upon the mountain of Sinai, in cloud and in fire. This, if ye are Christians, ye believe. It is, you say, recalled; but so my teachers have not taught me."

"Let our chaplain," said Beaumanoir, "stand forth, and tell this obstinate infidel—"

"Forgive the interruption," said Rebecca meekly: "I am a maiden, unskilled to dispute for my religion; but I can die for it, if it be God's will. Let me pray your answer to my demand of a champion."

"Give me her glove," said Beaumanoir. "This is indeed," he continued, as he looked at the flimsy texture and slender fingers, "a slight and frail gage for a purpose so deadly! Seest thou, Rebecca, as this thin and light glove of thine is to one of our heavy steel gauntlets, so is thy cause to that of the Temple, for it is our order which thou hast defied."

"Cast my innocence into the scale," answered Rebecca, "and the glove of silk shall outweigh the glove of iron."

"Then thou dost persist in thy refusal to confess thy guilt, and in that bold challenge which thou hast made?"

"I do persist, noble sir," answered Rebecca.

"So be it then, in the name of Heaven," said the Grand Master; "and may God show the right!"

"Amen," replied the preceptors around him, and the word was deeply echoed by the whole assembly.

"Brethren," said Beaumanoir, "you are aware that we might well have refused to this woman the benefit of the trial by combat; but, though a Jewess and an unbeliever, she is also a stranger and defenceless, and God forbid that she should ask the benefit of our mild laws and that it should be refused to her. Moreover, we are knights and soldiers as well as men of religion, and shame it were to us, upon any pretence, to refuse proffered combat. Thus, therefore, stands the case. Rebecca, the daughter of Isaac
York, is, by many frequent and suspicious circumstances, famed of sorcery practiced on the person of a noble knight of our holy order, and hath challenged the combat in defense of her innocence. To whom, reverend brethren, is it our opinion that we should deliver the gage of battle, naming him, at the same time, to be our champion on the Id?

"To Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whom it chiefly concerns," said the preceptor of Goodalricke, "and who, moreover, best knows how the truth stands in this matter."

"But if," said the Grand Master, "our brother Brian, under the influence of a charm or a spell—we speak it for the sake of precaution, for to the arm of none of our holy order would we more willingly confide this or a more weighty cause."

"Reverend father," answered the preceptor of Goodalricke, "no spell can affect the champion who comes forward to fight for the judgment of God."

"Thou sayest right, brother," said the Grand Master. Albert Malvoisin, give this gage of battle to Brian de Bois-Guilbert. It is our charge to thee, brother," he continued, addressing himself to Bois Guilbert, "that thou do thy battle manfully, nothing doubting that the good cause shall triumph. And do thou, Rebecca, attend, that we assign thee the third day from the present to find a champion."

"That is but brief space," answered Rebecca, "for a stranger, who is also of another faith, to find one who will battle, wagering life and honour for her cause, against a knight who is called an approved soldier."

"We may not extend it," answered the Grand Master; the field must be foughten in our presence, and divers weighty causes call us on the fourth day from hence."

"God's will be done!" said Rebecca; "I put my trust in him, to whom an instant is as effectual to save as a whole day."

"Thou hast spoken well, damsel," said the Grand Master; "but well know we who can array himself like an angel of light. It remains but to name a fitting place of combat, and, if it so hap, also of execution. Where is the preceptor of this house?"

Albert Malvoisin, still holding Rebecca's glove in his hand, was speaking to Bois-Guilbert very earnestly, but in a low voice.

"Howl!" said the Grand Master, "will he not receive the gage?"

"He will—he doth, most reverend father," said Malvoisin, slipping the glove under his own mantle. "And for the place of combat, I hold the fittest to be the lists of St. George belonging to this preceptory, and used by us for military exercise."

"It is well," said the Grand Master. "Rebecca, in those lists shall thou produce thy champion; and if thou fail to do so, or if thy champion shall be discomfited by the judgment of God, thou shalt then die the death of a sorceress, according to doom. Let this our judgment be recorded, and the record read aloud that no one may pretend ignorance."

One of the chaplains who acted as clerks to the chapter immediately engrossed the order in a huge volume, which contained the proceedings of the Templar Knights when solemnly assembled on such occasions; and when he had finished writing, the other read aloud the sentence of the Grand Master, which, when translated from the Norman-French in which it was couched, was expressed as follows:

"Rebecca, a Jewess, daughter of Isaac of York, being attainted of sorcery, seduction, and other damnable practices, practised on a knight of the most holy order of the Temple of Zion, doth deny the same, and saith that the testimony delivered against her this day is false, wicked, and disloyal; and that by lawful esseine of her body, as he

Essoine. Essoine signifies excuse, and here relates to the privilege of appearing by her champion, in excuse of her own plea, account of her sex. [Scott.]
unable to combat in her own behalf, she doth offer, by champion instead thereof, to avouch her case, he perform-his loyal devoir in all knightly sort, with such arms gage of battle do fully appertain, and that at her peril lost. And therewith she proffered her gage. And the having been delivered to the noble lord and knight, de Bois-Guilbert, of the holy order of the Temple of
, he was appointed to do this battle in behalf of his and himself, as injured and impaired by the practices the appellant. Wherefore the most reverend father and ant lord, Lucas Marquis of Beaumanoir, did allow of said challenge, and of the said essoine of the appellant’s
, and assigned the third day for the said combat, the being the inclosure called the lists of St. George, near the preceptory of Templestowe. And the Grand Master inted the appellant to appear there by her champion, ain of doom, as a person convicted of sorcery or sec-
and also the defendant so to appear, under the pen-of being held and adjudged recreant in case of default;
the noble lord and most reverend father aforesaid ap-ted the battle to be done in his presence, and according that is commendable and profitable in such a case.
may God aid the just cause!”
Amen!” said the Grand Master; and the word was ed by all around. Rebecca spoke not, but she looked Heaven, and, folding her hands, remained for a min-without change of attitude. She then modestly re-ted the Grand Master that she ought to be permitted opportunity of free communication with her friends, he purpose of making her condition known to them, procuring, if possible, some champion to fight in her f.
It is just and lawful,” said the Grand Master; “choose messenger thou shalt trust, and he shall have free unciation with thee in thy prison-chamber.”
“Is there,” said Rebecca, “any one here who, either for love of a good cause or for ample hire, will do the errand of a distressed being?”

All were silent; for none thought it safe, in the presence of the Grand Master, to avow any interest in the calumniated prisoner, lest he should be suspected of leaning towards Judaism. Not even the prospect of reward, far less any feelings of compassion alone, could surmount this apprehension.

Rebecca stood for a few moments in indescribable anxiety, and then exclaimed, “Is it really thus? And in English land am I to be deprived of the poor chance of safety which remains to me, for want of an act of charity which would not be refused to the worst criminal?”

Higg, the son of Snell, at length replied, “I am but a maimed man, but that I can at all stir or move was owing to her charitable assistance. I will do thine errand,” he added, addressing Rebecca, “as well as a crippled object can, and happy were my limbs fleet enough to repair the mischief done by my tongue. Alas! when I boasted of thy charity, I little thought I was leading thee into danger”

“God,” said Rebecca, “is the disposer of all. He can turn back the captivity of Judah, even by the weakest instrument. To execute his message the snail is as sure a messenger as the falcon. Seek out Isaac of York—here is that will pay for horse and man—let him have this scroll. I know not if it be of Heaven the spirit which inspires me, but most truly do I judge that I am not to die this death, and that a champion will be raised up for me. Farewell! Life and death are in thy haste.”

The peasant took the scroll, which contained only a few lines in Hebrew. Many of the crowd would have dissuaded him from touching a document so suspicious; but Higg was resolute in the service of his benefactress. “She had saved his body,” he said, “and he was confident she did not mean to peril his soul.”
I will get me,” he said, “my neighbour Buthan’s good, and I will be at York within as brief space as man east may.”

But, as it fortuned, he had no occasion to go so far, for a quarter of a mile from the gate of the preceptory met with two riders, whom, by their dress and their yellow caps, he knew to be Jews; and, on approaching nearly, discovered that one of them was his ancient brother Isaac of York. The other was the Rabbi Benel; and both had approached as near to the preceptory as they dared, on hearing that the Grand Master had ordained a chapter for the trial of a sorceress.

Brother Ben Samuel,” said Isaac, “my soul is dis-eased, and I wot not why. This charge of necromancy is often used for cloaking evil practices on our people.” Be of good comfort, brother,” said the physician; I canst deal with the Nazarenes as one possessing the mon of unrighteousness, and canst therefore purchase mity at their hands; it rules the savage minds of those duly men, even as the signet of the mighty Solomon did to command the evil genii. But what poor wretch is hither upon his crutches, desiring, as I think, some of me? Friend,” continued the physician, address-Higg, the son of Snell, “I refuse thee not the aid of art, but I relieve not with one asper those who beg alms upon the highway. Out upon thee! Hast thoualsy in thy legs? then let thy hands work for thy liveli-; for, albeit thou be’st unfit for a speedy post, or for useful shepherd, or for the warfare, or for the service of thy master, yet there be occupations—— How now, master?” said he, interrupting his harangue to look to Isaac, who had but glanced at the scroll which Higg d, when, uttering a deep groan, he fell from his mule dying man, and lay for a minute insensible.

1. Horse; in a more limited sense, work-horse. [Scott.]
2. Compare Robert Browning’s Abt Vogler.
3. A Turkish coin worth less than a cent.
The Rabbi now dismounted in great alarm, and applied the remedies which his art suggested for the recovery of his companion. He had even taken from his case a cupping apparatus, and was about to proceed to pluck out the object of his anxious solicitude, when the object of his anxious solicitude revived; but it was to dash his cap from his head, throw dust on his gray hairs. The physician was inclined to ascribe this sudden and violent emotion to effects of insanity; and, adhering to his original plan, he began once again to handle his implements. But he soon convinced him of his error.

"Child of my sorrow," he said, "well shouldst thou have been called Benoni, instead of Rebecca! Why should they bring down my gray hairs to the grave, till, in the bitterness of my heart, I curse God and die."

"Brother," said the Rabbi, in great surprise, "art thou a father in Israel, and dost thou utter words like these? I trust that the child of thy house yet liveth."

"She liveth," answered Isaac; "but it is as Dannah was called Belshezzar, even when within the demons. She is captive unto those men of Belial, and will wreak their cruelty upon her, sparing neither her youth nor her comely favour. Oh! she was as a crown green palms to my gray locks; and she must wither in the night, like the gourd of Jonah! Child of my love—of my old age!—oh, Rebecca, daughter of Rachel, darkness of the shadow of death hath encompassed the gods!"

"Yet read the scroll," said the Rabbi; "peradventure may be that we may yet find out a way of deliverance."

"Do thou read, brother," answered Isaac, "for mine eyes are as a fountain of water."

The physician read, but in their native language following words:

"To Isaac, the son of Adonikam, whom the Gentile Isaac of York, peace and the blessing of the prom 1 Benoni. The Hebrew name means "child of anguish," while Rebecca means "captivating," "delightsome." See Genesis XXXIX, 12.
plied unto thee! My father, I am as one doomed to perish that which my soul knoweth not, even for the crime of witchcraft. My father, if a strong man can be found to battle for my cause with sword and spear, according to the custom of the Nazarenes, and that within the lists of Battlestowe, on the third day from this time, perilously doth my life hang by a thread, and her who hath none to help her. But if this not be, let the virgins of our people mourn for me as one cast off, and for the hart that is stricken by the lion, and for the flower which is cut down by the scythe of the mower. Wherefore look now what thou doest, and if thou there be any rescue. One Nazarene warrior might and bear arms in my behalf, even Wilfred, son of Cedric, or the Gentiles call Ivanhoe. But he may not yet be the weight of his armour. Nevertheless, send the rings unto him, my father; for he hath favour among strong men of his people, and as he was our companion in house of bondage, he may find some one to do battle by my sake. And say unto him—even unto him—even Wilfred, the son of Cedric, that if Rebecca live, or if she die, she liveth or dieth wholly free of the guilt she urged withal. And if it be the will of God that thou be deprived of thy daughter, do not thou tarry, old man, in this land of bloodshed and cruelty; but betake thyself to Cordova, where thy brother liveth in safety, under shadow of the throne, even of the throne of Boabdil the sen; for less cruel are the cruelties of the Moors unto face of Jacob than the cruelties of the Nazarenes of Andal.”

Isaac listened with tolerable composure while Beniel read the letter, and then again resumed the tears and exclamations of Oriental sorrow, tearing his rents, besprinkling his head with dust, and ejaculating, daughter! my daughter! flesh of my flesh, and bone of bone!”
"Yet," said the Rabbi, "take courage, for this availeth nothing. Gird up thy loins, and seek out Wilfred, the son of Cedric. It may be he will help with counsel or with strength; for the youth hath favor in the eyes of Richard, called of the Nazarenes Cœur-de-lion, and the tidings that he hath returned are constant in land. It may be that he may obtain his letter, an signet, commanding these men of blood, who take name from the Temple to the dishonour thereof, that proceed not in their purposed wickedness."

"I will seek him out," said Isaac, "for he is a youth, and hath compassion for the exile of Jacob. he cannot bear his armour, and what other Christian do battle for the oppressed of Zion?"

"Nay, but," said the Rabbi, "thou speakest as one knoweth not the Gentiles. With gold shalt thou buy valour, even as with gold thou buyest thine own soul. Be of good courage, and do thou set forward to find out Wilfred of Ivanhoe. I will also up and be doing, for sin it were to leave thee in thy calamity. I will hire the city of York, where many warriors and strong men assembled, and doubt not I will find among them some who will do battle for thy daughter; for gold is their bond, and for riches will they pawn their lives as well as lands. Thou wilt fulfil, my brother, such promise as I make unto them in thy name?"

"Assuredly, brother," said Isaac, "and Heaven praised that raised me up a comforter in my misery! I beit, grant them not their full demand at once, for shalt find it the quality of this accursed people that will ask pounds, and peradventure accept of our. Nevertheless, be it as thou willest, for I am distracted this thing, and what would my gold avail me if the end of my love should perish?"

"Farewell," said the physician, "and may it be to as thy heart desireth."
hey embraced accordingly, and departed on their sev-roads. The crippled peasant remained for some time
ag. after them.
These dog Jews!” said he; “to take no more notice of the guild-brother than if I were a bond slave or a Turk, circumcised Hebrew like themselves! They might flung me a mancus¹ or two, however. I was not ed to bring their unhallowed scrawls, and run the risk ing bewitched, as more folks than one told me. And care I for the bit of gold that the wench gave me, if to come to harm from the priest next Easter at con-mon, and be obliged to give him twice as much to make with him, and be called the Jews’ flying post all my as it may hap, into the bargain? I think I was be-ed in earnest when I was beside that girl! But it always so with Jew or Gentile, whosoever came near none could stay when she had an errand to go; and whenever I think of her, I would give shop and tools her life.”

¹Ancus. An Anglo-Saxon coin worth about sixty cents
CHAPTER XXXIX

O maid, unrelenting and cold as thou art,
My bosom is proud as thine own.

SEWARD.

It was in the twilight of the day when her trial, could be called such, had taken place, that a low knock was heard at the door of Rebecca's prison-chamber. disturbed not the inmate, who was then engaged in evening prayer recommended by her religion, and was concluded with a hymn we have ventured thus to translate into English:

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out of the land of bondage came,
Her fathers' God before her moved,
An awful guide, in smoke and flame,
By day, along the astonish'd lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia's crimson'd sands
Return'd the fiery column's glow.

There rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answer'd keen
And Zion's daughters pour'd their lays,
With priest's and warrior's voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wanders lone;
Our fathers would not know Thy ways,
And Thou hast left them to their own.

But, present still, though now unseen,
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of Thee a cloudy screen
To temper the deceitful ray.
And oh, when stoops on Judah's path
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be Thou, long-suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning and a shining light.

520
Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn;
No censer round our altar beams,
And mute our timbrel, trump, and horn.
But Thou hast said, The blood of goat,
The flesh of rams, I will not prize;
A contrite heart, an humble thought,
Are Mine accepted sacrifice.

When the sounds of Rebecca's devotional hymn had Away in silence, the low knock at the door was again
Red. "Enter," she said, "if thou art a friend; and I, I have not the means of refusing thy entrance."
"I am," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, entering the apart-
"friend or foe, Rebecca, as the event of this interview
Make me."

Arm'd at the sight of this man, whose licentious pas-tie considered as the root of her misfortunes, Rebecca Backward with a cautious and alarmed, yet not a Lass, demeanour into the farthest corner of the apart-
As if determined to retreat as far as she could, but to
Her ground when retreat became no longer possible.
Riev herself into an attitude not of defiance, but of Jion, as one that would avoid provoking assault, yet
Solute to repel it, being offered, to the utmost of her
You have no reason to fear me, Rebecca," said the Far; "or, if I must so qualify my speech, you have Now no reason to fear me."
"Fear you not, Sir Knight," replied Rebecca, although Breath seemed to belie the heroism of her
S; "my trust is strong, and I fear thee not."
You have no cause," answered Bois-Guilbert, gravely;
Former frantic attempts you have not now to dread.
Your call are guards over whom I have no authority.
Are designed to conduct you to death, Rebecca, yet
Not suffer you to be insulted by any one, even by me;
V frenzy—for frenzy it is—to urge me so far."
"May heaven be praised!" said the Jewess; "death is the least of my apprehensions in this den of evil."

"Ay," replied the Templar, "the idea of death is received by the courageous mind, when the road to it is sudden and open. A thrust with a lance, a stroke with a sword, were to me little; to you, a spring from a dizzy height, a stroke with a sharp poniard, has no terrors compared with what either thinks disgrace. Mark me—I say this—perhaps mine own sentiments of honour are not fantastic, Rebecca, than thine are; but we know alike how to die for them."

"Unhappy man," said the Jewess; "and art thoucondemned to expose thy life for principles of which thy judgment does not acknowledge the solidity? Surely it is a parting with your treasure for that which is not. But deem not so of me. Thy resolution may fluctuate with the wild and changeful billows of human opinion; but mine is anchored on the Rock of Ages."

" Silence, maiden," answered the Templar; "such course now avails but little. Thou art condemned to a sudden and easy death, such as misery chooses to despair welcomes, but a slow, wretched, protracted course of torture, suited to what the diabolical bigotry of the men calls thy crime."

"And to whom—if such my fate—to whom do I owe this?" said Rebecca; "surely only to him who, for a selfish and brutal cause, dragged me hither, and who, for some unknown purpose of his own, strives to exact the wretched fate to which he exposed me."

"Think not," said the Templar, "that I have so exposed thee; I would have bucklered thee against such shafts with my own bosom, as freely as ever I exposed it."

"Had thy purpose been the honourable protection of the innocent," said Rebecca, "I had thanked thee, but as it is, thou hast claimed merit for it so often..."
ee life is worth nothing to me, preserved at the ich thou wouldst exact for it.”
ce with thine upbraidings, Rebecca,” said the Tem-have my own cause of grief, and brook not that aches should add to it.”
at is thy purpose, then, Sir Knight?” said the “speak it briefly. If thou hast aught to do save to the misery thou hast caused, let me know it; and so it please you, leave me to myself. The step time and eternity is short but terrible, and I have ments to prepare for it.”
terceive, Rebecca,” said Bois-Guilbert, “that thou inue to burden me with the charge of distresses ost fain would I have prevented.”
Knight,” said Rebecca, “I would avoid reproaches;
t is more certain than that I owe my death to thine passion?”
err—you err,” said the Templar, hastily, “if you what I could neither foresee nor prevent to my puregency. Could I guess the unexpected arrival of rd, whom some flashes of frantic valour, and the ielded by fools to the stupid self-torments of an have raised for the present above his own merits, mmon sense, above me, and above the hundreds of or who think and feel as men free from such silly astic prejudices as are the grounds of his opinions
on?”
, said Rebecca, “you sate a judge upon me; innoost innocent—as you knew me to be, you concurred emnation; and if I right understood, are your-appear in arms to assert my guilt, and assure my ent.”
my patience, maiden,” replied the Templar. “No ws so well as thine own tribes how to submit to the so to trim their bark as to make advantage even erse wind.”
CHAPTER XXXIV

King John. I'll tell thee what, my friend,
He is a very serpent in my way;
And wheresoe'er this foot of mine doth tread,
He lies before me. Dost thou understand me?

King John.

There was brave feasting in the Castle of York, which Prince John had invited those nobles, prelates, and leaders by whose assistance he hoped to carry through his ambitious projects upon his brother's throne. Waldemar Fitzurse, his able and politic agent, was at secret work among them, tempering all to that pitch of courage which was necessary in making an open declaration of their purpose. But their enterprise was delayed by the absence of more than one main limb of the confederacy. The stubborn and daring, though brutal, courage of Front-de-Bœuf; the buoyant spirits and bold bearing of De Bracy; the sagacity, martial experience, and renowned valour of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, were important to the success of their conspiracy; and, while cursing in secret their necessary and unmeaning absence, neither John nor adviser dared to proceed without them. Isaac the Jew also seemed to have vanished, and with him the hope of certain sums of money, making up the subsidy for which Prince John had contracted with that Israelite and his brethren. This deficiency was likely to prove perilous in an emergency so critical.

It was on the morning after the fall of Torquemada that a confused report began to spread abroad in the city of York that De Bracy and Bois-Guilbert, with their nt-de-Bœuf, had been taken or slain. Wal-ht the rumour to Prince John, announcing, ed its truth the more that they had set out attendance, for the purpose of committing an the Saxon Cedric and his attendants. At an-the Prince would have treated this deed of good jest; but now that it interfered with and own plans, he exclaimed against the perpespoke of the broken laws, and the infringe-ic order and of private property, in a tone have become King Alfred.
principled marauders!” he said; “were I ever onarch of England, I would hang such trans-
the drawbridges of their own castles.”
ecome monarch of England,” said his Ahitho-
, “it is necessary not only that your Grace re the transgressions of these unprincipled out that you should afford them your protestanding your laudable zeal for the laws they bit of infringing. We shall be finely helped, axons should have realised your Grace’s vision g feudal drawbridges into gibbets; and yonited Cedric seemeth one to whom such an might occur. Your Grace is well aware, it ugerous to stir without Front-de-Bœuf, De ne Templar; and yet we have gone too far to safety.”
John struck his forehead with impatience, and to stride up and down the apartment.
ains,” he said—“the base, treacherous villains, at this pinch!”
rather the feather-pated, giddy madmen,” ar, “who must be toying with follies when a was in hand.”

_Ahithophel was the counselor of King David, but followed elion to his own destruction. See 2 Samuel XV. 31-35._

It’s satire, Absalom and Ahithophel.
What is to be done?” said the Prince, stopping short.

“I know nothing which can be done,” answered his counsellor, “save that which I have already taken order for; came not to bewail this evil chance with your Grace upon; I had done my best to remedy it.”

“Thou art ever my better angel, Waldemar,” said the Prince; “and when I have such a chancellor to advise me, the reign of John will be renowned in our time. What hast thou commanded?”

“I have ordered Louis Winkelbrand, De Bracy’s tenant, to cause his trumpet sound to horse, and to set up his banner and to set presently forth towards the town of Front-de-Bœuf, to do what yet may be done for succour of our friends.”

Prince John’s face flushed with the pride of a child who has undergone what it conceives to be a trial.

“By the face of God!” he said, “Waldemar, how much hast thou taken upon thee! and over-maladroit wert to cause trumpet to blow, or banner to be set up in town where ourselves were in presence, without our command.”

“I crave your Grace’s pardon,” said Fitzurse, cursing the idle vanity of his patron; “but pressed, and even the loss of minutes might have been saved; but judged it best to take this much burden upon matter of such importance to your Grace’s interests.

“Thou art pardoned, Fitzurse,” said the Prince; “thy purpose hath stirred for thy hasty rush, whom have we here? De Bracy himself, by whom we are come before us.”

It was indeed De Bracy, “bloody with the mangled heads of his enemies, obstinate fray, being broken, defaced, an arm, a hand, a leg, red with speed.” His armour bore all the marks of the blood in many places, and covered with caked blood.
e crest to the spur. Undoing his helmet, he placed it on the table, and stood a moment as if to collect himself before he told his news.

"De Bracy," said Prince John, "what means this? Speak, I charge thee! Are the Saxons in rebellion?"

"Speak, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, almost in the same manner with his master, "thou wert wont to be a man. Where is the Templar? where Front-de-Bœuf?"

"The Templar is fled," said De Bracy; "Front-de-Bœuf I will never see more. He has found a red grave among the blazing rafters of his own castle, and I alone am aped to tell you."

"Cold news," said Waldemar, "to us, though you speak fire and conflagration."

"The worst news is not yet said," answered De Bracy; and, coming up to Prince John, he uttered in a low and emphatic tone: "Richard is in England; I have seen and spoken with him."

Prince John turned pale, tottered, and caught at the back of an oaken bench to support himself, much like to a man who receives an arrow in his bosom.

"Thou ravest, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, "it cannot be."

"It is as true as truth itself," said De Bracy; "I was his prisoner, and spoke with him."

"With Richard Plantagenet, sayest thou?" continued Fitzurse.

"And thou wert his prisoner?" said Waldemar; "he is at the head of a power?"

"No; only a few outlawed yeomen were around him, to these his person is unknown. I heard him say he about to depart from them. He joined them only to resist at the storming of Torquilstone."

"Ay," said Fitzurse, "such is indeed the fashion of ward—a true knight-errant he, and will wander in wild for, if I do a good deed on the one hand, yet, on the other, it goeth to the vantage of a Jew, and in so much against my conscience. Yet, if the Israelite will advantagen of our dortour, I will take it on my conscience to aid him in the matter of his daughter.”

“For a score of marks to the dortour,” said the outlaw—“Be still, I say, Isaac!—or for a brace of silver candlesticks to the altar, we will not stand with you.”

“Nay, but, good Didon Bend-the-Bow,” said Isaac, endeavouring to interpose.

“Good Jew—good beast—good earthworm!” said the yeoman, losing patience; “an thou dost go on to puy thy filthy lucre in the balance with thy daughter’s life and honour, by Heaven, I will strip thee of every maravedi thou hast in the world before three days are out!”

Isaac shrunk together, and was silent.

“And what pledge am I to have for all this?” said Prior.

“When Isaac returns successful through your mediation,” said the outlaw, “I swear by St. Hubert, I will make that he pays thee the money in good silver, or I will with him for it in such sort, he had better have twenty such sums.”

“Well then, Jew,” said Aymer, “since I must meddle in this matter, let me have the use of thy tablets—though, hold—rather than use thy would fast for twenty-four hours, and where sh we one?”

“If your holy scruples can dispense with Jew’s tablets, for the pen I can find a remedy; yeoman; and, bending his bow, he aimed his wild goose which was soaring over their heads, guard of a phalanx of his tribe, which were wi

1. Dortour. Or dormitory. [Scott.]
y to the distant and solitary fens of Holderness. The head came fluttering down, transfixed with the arrow.

"There, Prior," said the captain, "are quills enow to supply all the monks of Jorvaux for the next hundred years, an they take not to writing chronicles."

The Prior sat down, and at great leisure indited an letter to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, and having carefully folded up the tablets, delivered them to the Jew, saying:
This will be thy safe-conduct to the preceptory of Temestowe, and, as I think, is most likely to accomplish the delivery of thy daughter, if it be well backed with proffers advantage and commodity at thine own hand; for, trust
well, the good knight Bois-Guilbert is of their confratermony that do nought for nought."

"Well, Prior," said the outlaw, "I will detain thee no ger here than to give the Jew a quittance for the six hundred crowns at which thy ransom is fixed—I accept him for my paymaster; and if I hear that ye boggle at owing him in his accomplts the sum so paid by him, St.
try refuse me, an I burn not the abbey over thine head, ough I hang ten years the sooner!"

With a much worse grace than that wherewith he had read the letter to Bois-Guilbert, the Prior wrote an quittance, discharging Isaac of York of six hundred corns, advanced to him in his need for acquittal of his som, and faithfully promising to hold true compt with a for that sum.

"And now," said Prior Aymer, "I will pray you of stitution of my mules and palfreys, and the freedom of reverend brethren attending upon me, and also of the imal rings, jewels, and fair vestures of which I have en despoiled, having now satisfied you for my ransom as e prisoner."

"Touching your brethren, Sir Prior," said Locksley, ey shall have present freedom, it were unjust to detain
; touching your horses and mules, they shall also b
restored, with such spending money as may enable you to reach York, for it were cruel to deprive you of the means of journeying. But as concerning rings, jewels, chains, and what else, you must understand that we are men of tender consciences, and will not yield to a venerable man like yourself, who should be dead to the vanities of this life, the strong temptation to break the rule of his foundation, by wearing rings, chains, or other vain gauds.

"Think what you do, my masters," said the Prior, "you put your hand on the church's patrimony. These things are inter res sacras, and I wot not what judgments might ensue were they to be handled by laical hands."

"I will take care of that, reverend Prior," said the hermit of Copmanhurst; "for I will wear them myself."

"Friend, or brother," said the Prior, in answer to the solution of his doubts, "if thou hast really taken religious orders, I pray thee to look how thou wilt answer to the official for the share thou hast taken in this day's work."

"Friend Prior," returned the hermit, "you are aware that I belong to a little diocese where I am my own diocesan and care as little for the Bishop of York as I do for the Abbot of Jorvaulx, the Prior, and all the conventuals."

"Thou art utterly irregular," said the Prior—"of those disorderly men who, taking on them the sacred character without due cause, profane the holy rites, and danger the souls of those who take counsel at their hands. lapides pro pane condonantes iis, giving them stones instead of bread, as the Vulgate hath it."

"Nay," said the Friar, "an my brain-pan could have been broken by Latin, it had not held so long together. I say, that easing a world of such misprised priests as the art of their jewels and their gimcracks is a lawful sport of the Egyptians."

1 INTER RES SACRAS. "Among sacred things."

2 LAPIDES, etc. See Luke XI. 11.
"Thou be'st a hedge-priest," said the Prior, in great wrath "excommunicabo vos."

"Thou be'st thyself more like a thief and a heretic," said the Friar, equally indignant; "I will pouch up no such affront before my parishioners as thou thinkest it not shame to put upon me, although I be a reverend other to thee. Ossa ejus perfringam, I will break our bones, as the Vulgate hath it."

"Hola!" cried the captain, "come the reverend brethren to such terms? Keep thine assurance of peace, Friar. Prior, an thou hast not made thy peace perfect with God, provoke the Friar no further. Hermit, let the reverend other depart in peace, as a ransomed man."

The yeomen separated the incensed priests, who con- tinued to raise their voices, vituperating each other in bad Latin, which the Prior delivered the more fluently, and the Hermit with the greater vehemence. The Prior at length collected himself sufficiently to be aware that he was compromising his dignity by squabbling with such a hedge-priest as the outlaw's chaplain, and being joined by his attendants, rode off with considerably less pomp, and in a much more apostolical condition, so far as worldly matters were concerned, than he had exhibited before this encounter.

It remained that the Jew should produce some secur- ity for the ransom which he was to pay on the Prior's account, as well as upon his own. He gave, accordingly, an order sealed with his signet, to a brother of his tribe at York, requiring him to pay to the bearer the sum of a thousand [eleven hundred] crowns, and to deliver certain merchandises specified in the note.

"By brother Sheva," he said, groaning deeply, "hath any brother of my warehouses."

*HEDGE-PRIEST. See Appendix. Note G. [Scott.]
*Ossa, etc. See Isaiah XXXVIII. 13.
"And of the vaulted chamber," whispered Locksley.

"No, no—may Heaven forefend!" said Isaac; "evil is the hour that let any one whomsoever into that secret!"

"It is safe with me," said the outlaw, "so be that this thy scroll produce the sum therein nominated and set down. But what now, Isaac? art dead? art stupefied? hast the payment of a thousand crowns put thy daughter's peril out of thy mind?"

The Jew started to his feet: "No, Diccon, no; I will presently set forth. Farewell, thou whom I may not call good, and dare not, and will not, call evil."

Yet, ere Isaac departed, the outlaw chief bestowed on him this parting advice: "Be liberal of thine offers, Isaac, and spare not thy purse for thy daughter's safety. Credit me, that the gold thou shalt spare in her cause will hereafter give thee as much agony as if it were poured molten down thy throat."

Isaac acquiesced with a deep groan, and set forth on his journey, accompanied by two tall foresters, who were to be his guides, and at the same time his guards, through the wood.

The Black Knight, who had seen with no small interest these various proceedings, now took his leave of the outlaw in turn; nor could he avoid expressing his surprise at having witnessed so much of civil policy amongst persons cast out from all the ordinary protection and influence of the laws.

"Good fruit, Sir Knight," said the yeoman, "will sometimes grow on a sorry tree; and evil times are not always productive of evil alone and unmixed. Amongst those who are drawn into this lawless state, there are doubtless, numbers who wish to exercise its license with some moderation, and some who regret it may be, that they are obliged to follow such a trade at all."

"And to one of those," said the Knight, "I am now, I presume, speaking?"
ight," said the outlaw, "we have each our se-are welcome to form your judgment of me, use my conjectures touching you, though our shafts may hit the mark they are shot at.
not pray to be admitted into your mystery, be that I preserve my own."

"Pardon, brave outlaw," said the Knight, of is just. But it may be we shall meet here-ess of concealment on either side. Meanwhile ends, do we not?"

"As my hand upon it," said Locksley; "and I
he hand of a true Englishman, though an out-present."

ere is mine in return," said the Knight, "and oured by being clasped with yours. For he od, having the unlimited power to do evil, dee not only for the good which he performs, evil which he forbears. Fare thee well, gal-rtd that fair fellowship; and he of the Fretuting upon his strong war-horse, rode off ennyson's picturesque drama, The Foresters, deals with the Hood and his companions, introducing also Prince John Richard.

which John traversed the apartment with unequal and
ordered steps.
“Bardon,” said he, “what did Waldemar desire thee?”
“Two resolute men, well acquainted with these norern wilds, and skilful in tracking the tread of man or horse.”
“And thou hast fitted him?”
“Let your Grace never trust me else,” answered
master of the spies. “One is from Hexhamshire; he wont to trace the Tynedale and Teviotdale thieves; the bloodhound follows the slot of a hurt deer. The oth-is Yorkshire bred, and has twanged his bowstring right in merry Sherwood; he knows each glade and dingle,
and high-wood, betwixt this and Richmond.”
“’Tis well,” said the Prince. “Goes Waldemar with them?”
“Instantly,” said Bardon.
“With what attendance?” asked John, carelessly.
“Broad Thoresby goes with him, and Witheral, to they call, for his cruelty, Stephen Steel-Heart; and the northern men-at-arms that belonged to Ralph Middle-gang; they are called the Spears of Spyinghow.” “’Tis well,” said Prince John; then added, after moment’s pause: “Bardon, it imports our service that keep a strict watch on Maurice De Bracy, so that he not observe it, however. And let us know of his movements from time to time, with whom he converses, what he doth. Fail not in this, as thou wilt be answerable.”
Hugh Bardon bowed, and retired.
“If Maurice betrays me,” said Prince John—“if he betray me, as his bearing leads me to fear, I will have head, were Richard thundering at the gates of York.”

1 Slot. The track of a deer or other animal of the chase; the sent.

2 PRINCE JOHN. Shakespeare in King John presents a remarkable traiture of John after he has assumed the crown. In connection chapter compare, especially, King John III., 3.
CHAPTER XXXV

Arouse the tiger of Hyrcanian deserts,
Strive with the half-starved lion for his prey;
Lesser the risk, than rouse the slumbering fire
Of wild Fanaticism.

Anonymous.

Our tale now returns to Isaac of York. Mounted upon le, the gift of the outlaw, with two tall yeomen to act as guard and guides, the Jew had set out for the prey of Templestowe, for the purpose of negotiating his daughter's redemption. The preceptory was but a day's journey from the demolished castle of Torquilstone, and
the Jew had hoped to reach it before nightfall; accordingly, having dismissed his guides at the verge of the for-and rewarded them with a piece of silver, he began his journey with such speed as his weariness permitted him.
But his strength failed him totally ere he had covered within four miles of the Temple court; racking pains shot along his back and through his limbs, and the profound anguish which he felt at heart being now augmented by bodily suffering, he was rendered altogether innable of proceeding farther than a small market-town, where dwelt a Jewish rabbi of his tribe, eminent in the Rabbinical profession, and to whom Isaac was well known.
At length, Ben Israel received his suffering countrymen with kindness which the law prescribed, and which the rabbis practised to each other. He insisted on his betak-himself to repose, and used such remedies as were then in use to check the progress of the fever which afflicted him, fatigue, ill-usage, and sorrow had brought upon the poor old Jew.
On the morrow, when Isaac proposed to arise and sue his journey, Nathan remonstrated against his plan both as his host and as his physician. "It might kill him," he said, "his life." But Isaac replied, "That than life and death depended upon his going that morning to Templestowe."

"To Templestowe!" said his host with surprise; he felt his pulse, and then muttered to himself, "His fever abated, yet seems his mind somewhat alienated and disturbed."

"And why not to Templestowe?" answered the pilgrim. "I grant thee, Nathan, that it is a dwelling of the house of the despised Children of the Promise are a blighting-block and an abomination; yet thou knowest my pressing affairs of traffic sometimes carry us among bloodthirsty Nazarene soldiers, and that we visit the orders of the Templars, as well as the commanderies of the Knights Hospitalers, as they are called."

"I know it well," said Nathan; "but wottest thou Lucas de Beaumanoir, the chief of their order, and they term Grand Master, is now himself at Templestowe."

"I know it not," said Isaac; "our last letters from brethren at Paris avised us that he was at that city seething Philip for aid against the Sultan Saladin."

"He hath since come to England, unexpected brethren," said Ben Israel; "and he cometh among us like a strong and outstretched arm to correct and punish. His countenance is kindled in anger against those who have parted from the vow which they have sworn, and great is the fear of those sons of Belial. Thou hast heard of his name?"

"It is well known unto me," said Isaac: "the God

1 COMMANDERIES. The establishments of the Knight Templars were called Preceptories, and the title of those who presided in the order was Preceptor. As the principal Knights of Saint John were termed Commanders, and the houses Commanderies. But these terms were sometimes used indiscriminately. [Scott.]
this Lucas Beaumanoir as a man zealous to slay every point of the Nazarene law; and our brethren armed him a fierce destroyer of the Saracens, and a bane to the Children of the Promise.”

“Truly have they termed him,” said Nathan the man. “Other Templars may be moved from the pursuit of their heart by pleasure, or bribed by promise of gold and silver; but Beaumanoir is of a different stamp—sensuality, despising treasure, and pressing forward which they call the crown of martyrdom—the God of heaven shall speedily send it unto him, and unto them all! May this proud man extended his glove over the head of Judah, as holy David over Edom, holding the hand of a Jew to be an offering of as sweet savour as that of a Saracen. Impious and false things has he been of the virtues of our medicines, as if they were vices of Satan—the Lord rebuke him!”

Nevertheless,” said Isaac, “I must present myself at Jerusalem, though he hath made his face like unto a furnace seven times heated.”

The Rabbi listened with interest, and testified sympathy after the fashion of his people, rending his clothes and saying, “Ah, my daughter!—ah, my daughter! for the beauty of Zion! Alas! for the captivity of Judah thou seest,” said Isaac, “how it stands with me, and may not tarry. Peradventure, the presence of this Beaumanoir, being the chief man over them, may avail Daniel in the den of lions into which he is cast; and may it go well with thee, even as thine heart zu. Report.”
wisheth. Yet, if thou canst, keep thee from the presence of the Grand Master, for to do foul scorn to our prince in his morning and evening delight. It may be, inclined couldst speak with Bois-Guilbert in private, thou shouldest better prevail with him; for men say that these avaricious Nazarenes are not of one mind in the preceptor's favor, and their counsels be confounded and brought to shame. But do thou, brother, return to me as if it were to thee a day of thy father, and bring me word how it has sped with thee, and well do I hope thou wilt bring with thee Rebecca the scholar of the wise Miriam, whose cures thee hast slandered as if they had been wrought by necromancers.

Isaac accordingly bade his friend farewell, and in an hour's riding brought him before the preceptor of Templestowe. This establishment of the Templars was seated in the fair meadows and pastures, which the devotion of the former preceptor had bestowed upon their order. It was strong and well fortified, a point never neglected by their knights, and which the disordered state of England rendered peculiarly necessary. Two halberdiers, clad in black, guarded the drawbridge, and others, in the same livery, glided to and fro upon the walls with a funeral resemble like spectres more than soldiers. The inferiors of the order were thus dressed, ever since their white garments, similar to those of the knight esquires, had given rise to a combination of certain brethren in the mountains of Palestine, terming themselves Templars, and bringing great dishonour on the order. A knight was now and then seen to cross the same in his long white cloak, his head depressed on his shoulders and his arms folded. They passed each other, unchanced to meet, with a slow, solemn, and mute gravity for such was the rule of their order, quoting thereupon holy texts. 1 2HOLY TEXTS. See Proverbs X. 19; XXVIII. 32.
fe and death are in the power of the tongue." In a and the stern, ascetic rigour of the Temple discipline, and had been so long exchanged for prodigal and li-indulgence, seemed at once to have revived at Tem-
towe under the severe eye of Lucas Beaumanoir.
Isaac paused at the gate, to consider how he might seek ance in the manner most likely to bespeak favour; for
was well aware that to his unhappy race the reviving icism of the order was not less dangerous than their principled licentiousness; and that his religion would be object of hate and persecution in the one case, as his
th would have exposed him in the other to the extor-
s of unrelenting oppression.

Meantime, Lucas Beaumanoir walked in a small garden
ning to the preceptory, included within the precincts exterior fortification, and held sad and confidential
unication with a brother of his order, who had come company from Palestine.
The Grand Master was a man advanced in age, as was fied by his long grey beard, and the shaggy grey eyrs, overhanging eyes of which, however, years had bee to quench the fire. A formidable warrior, his th-severe features retained the soldier’s fierceness of ex-sion; an ascetic bigot, they were no less marked by the iation of abstinence, and the spiritual pride of the satisfied devotee. Yet with these severer traits of ignomy, there was mixed somewhat striking and arising, doubtless, from the great part which his office called upon him to act among monarchs and
ces, and from the habitual exercise of supreme author-over the valiant and high-born knights who were united rules of the order. His stature was tall, and his
, undepressed by age and toil, was erect and stately.
white mantle was shaped with severe regularity, acting to the rule of St. Bernard himself, being composed of what was then called burrel cloth, exactly fitted to the size of the wearer, and bearing on the left shoulder the octangular cross peculiar to the order, formed of red cloth. No vair or ermine decked this garment; but in respect of his age, the Grand Master, as permitted by the rules, wore his doublet lined and trimmed with the softest lambskin, dressed with the wool outwards, which was the nearest approach he could regularly make to the use of fur, then the greatest luxury of dress. In his hand he bore that singular abacus, or staff of office, with which Templars are usually represented, having at the upper end a round plate, on which was engraved the cross of the order, inscribed within a circle or orle, as heralds term it. His companion, who attended on this great personage, had nearly the same dress in all respects, but his extreme deference towards his superior showed that no other equality subsisted between them. The preceptor, for such he was in rank, walked not in a line with the Grand Master, but just so far behind that Beaumanoir could speak to him without turning round his head.

"Conrade," said the Grand Master, "dear companion of battles and my toils, to thy faithful bosom alone I can litide my sorrows. To thee alone can I tell how, since I came to this kingdom, I have desired to be dissolved and to be with the just. Not one object in England has met mine eye which it could rest upon with pleasure, save the tombs of our brethren, beneath the massive roof of our Temple Church\(^2\) in yonder proud capital. 'O valiant Robert de Ros!' did I exclaim internally, as I gazed upon these good soldiers of the cross, where they lie sculptured on their sepulchres—'O worthy William de Mareschall open your marble cells, and take to your repose a weary brother, who would rather strive with a hundred thousand pagans than witness the decay of our holy order.'"

\(^1\) Vair. Some sort of fur.

\(^2\) Temple Church. This edifice is still standing as a part of the old temple in the City of London. It was consecrated in 1185, and restored in is but true," answered Conrade Mont-Fitchet—"it too true; and the irregularities of our brethren in d are even more gross than those in France."

because they are more wealthy," answered the Grand. "Bear with me, brother, although I should sometime myself. Thou knowest the life I have led, each point of my order, striving with devils em- and disembodied, striking down the roaring lion, eth about seeking whom he may devour, like a good and devout priest, wheresoever I met with him, blessed St. Bernard hath prescribed to us in the fifth capital of our rule, Ut leo sempex feriatus.² But, Holy Temple! the zeal which hath devoured my ce and my life, yea, the very nerves and marrow of es—by that very Holy Temple I swear to thee, that myself and some few that still retain the ancient of our order, I look upon no brethren whom I can my soul to embrace under that holy name. What statutes, and how do our brethren observe them? should wear no vain or worldly ornament, no crest their helmet, no gold upon stirrup or bridle-bit; yet w go pranked out so proudly and so gaily as the ldiers of the Temple? They are forbidden by our to take one bird by means of another, to shoot with bow or arblast, to halloo to a hunting-horn, or the horse after game; but now, at hunting and g, and each idle sport of wood and river, who so as the Templars in all these fond vanities? They bidden to read, save what their superior permitted, to what is read, save such holy things as may be aloud during the hours of refection; but lo! their are at the command of idle minstrels, and their eyes no, etc. In the ordinances of the Knights of the Temple this phrase in a variety of forms, and occurs in almost every chapter, as if it signal-word of the Order; which may account for its being so fre- ent in the grand master's mouth. [Scott.] The phrase means "That satan) should always be smitten down." See 1 Peter V. 8.

⁵ Chapter.

study empty romaunts.\textsuperscript{1} They were commanded to pate magic and heresy; lo! they are charged with study the accursed cabalistical secrets of the Jews, and the of the paynim Saracens. Simplesness of diet was scribed to them—roots, pottage, gruels, eating flesh thrice a-week, because the accustomed feeding on flour a dishonourable corruption of the body; and behold, tables groan under delicate fare. Their drink was water; and now, to drink like a Templar is the bo be each jolly boon companion. This very garden, filled with curious herbs and trees sent from Eastern or better becomes the harem of an unbelieving Emir\textsuperscript{3} the plot which Christian monks should devote to raise homely pot-herbs. And oh, Conrade! well it were the relaxation of discipline stopped even here! Well knowest that we were forbidden to receive those women who at the beginning were associated as sist our order, because, saith the forty-sixth chapter Ancient Enemy hath, by female society, withdrawn the right path to paradise. Nay, in the last of the being, as it were, the copestone which our blessed for placed on the pure and undefiled doctrine which beenjoined, we are prohibited from offering, even to oters and our mothers, the kiss of affection: \textit{ut om mulierum fugiantur oscula}.\textsuperscript{3} I shame to speak—I to think—of the corruptions which have rushed in us even like a flood. The souls of our pure founders spirits of Hugh de Payen and Godfrey de St. Omer, the blessed seven who first joined in dedicating their to the service of the Temple, are disturbed even in the joyment of paradise itself. I have seen them, Conrade, the visions of the night: their sainted eyes shed tears the sins and follies of their brethren, and for the fou

\textsuperscript{1} \textit{ROMAUNTS. Romances.}

\textsuperscript{2} \textit{EMIR. A title of dignity among the Turks and Arabs.}

\textsuperscript{3} \textit{UT OMNIIUM, etc. * That the kisses of all women are to be shun}
IVANHOE

ful luxury in which they wallow. ‘Beaumanoir,’ y, ‘thou slumberest; awake! There is a stain in the of the Temple, deep and foul as that left by the of leprosy on the walls of the infected houses1 of The soldiers of the Cross, who should shun the
of a woman as the eye of a basilisk, live in open sin, the females of their own race only, but with the ers of the accursed heathen, and more accursed Beaumanoir, thou sleepest; up, and avenge our Slay the sinners, male and female! Take to thee end of Phinehas!’2 The vision fled, Conrade, but as ed I could still hear the clank of their mail, and see ing of their white mantles. And I will do accord-their word: I will purify the fabric of the Tem-and the unclean stones in which the plague is, I will and cast out of the building.”

get bethink thee, reverend father,” said Mont-Fit-the stain hath become engrained by time and con-
; let thy reformation be cautious, as it is just and o, Mont-Fitchet,” answered the stern old man, “it sharp and sudden; the order is on the crisis of its

The sobriety, self-devotion, and piety of our predemade us powerful friends; our presumption, our

our luxury have raised up against us mighty ene-

We must cast away these riches, which are a temp-
to princes; we must lay down that presumption, is an offence to them; we must reform that license
ners, which is a scandal to the whole Christian

Or—mark my words—the order of the Temple utterly demolished, and the place thereof shall no be known among the nations.”

ow may God avert such a calamity!” said the pre-

1. See the 13th chapter of Leviticus. (Scott.)
2. See Numbers XXV. 7, 8.
“Amen,” said the Grand Master, with solemnity, “but we must deserve His aid. I tell thee, Conrade, that neither the powers in Heaven, nor the powers on earth, will longer endure the wickedness of this generation. My intelligence is sure—the ground on which our fabric is reared is already undermined, and each addition we make to the structure of our greatness will only sink it the sooner in the abyss. We must retrace our steps, and show ourselves the faithful champions of the Cross, sacrificing to our calling not alone our blood and our lives, not alone our lusts and our vices, but our ease, our comforts, and our natural affections, and act as men convinced that many a pleasure which may be lawful to others is forbidden to the avowed soldier of the Temple.”

At this moment a squire, clothed in a threadbare garment—for the aspirants after this holy order wore during their noviciate the cast-off garments of the knights—entered the garden, and, bowing profoundly before the Grand Master, stood silent, awaiting his permission ere presumed to tell his errand.

“Is it not more seemly,” said the Grand Master, “to this Damian, clothed in the garments of Christian humility, thus appear with reverend silence before his superior than but two days since, when the fond fool was decked a painted coat, and jangling as pert and as proud as a popinjay? Speak, Damian, we permit thee. What thine errand?”

“A Jew stands without the gate, noble and reverend father,” said the squire, “who prays to speak with brother Brian de Bois-Guilbert.”

“Thouwert right to give me knowledge of it,” said the Grand Master; “in our presence a preceptor is but a common compeer of our order, who may not walk according to his own will, but to that of his Master, even according to the text, ‘In the hearing of the ear he hath obey
It imports us especially to know of this Bois-Guil proceedings,” said he, turning to his companion.
report speaks him brave and valiant,” said Conrade.
and truly is he so spoken of,” said the Grand Master;
valour only we are not degenerated from our predeses, the heroes of the Cross. But brother Brian came our order a moody and disappointed man, stirred, I
me, to take our vows and to renounce the world, not verity of soul, but as one whom some touch of light ent had driven into penitence. Since then he hath be an active and earnest agitator, a murmurer, and a ator, and a leader amongst those who impugn our
ity; not considering that the rule is given to the ven by the symbol of the staff and the rod—the support the infirmities of the weak, the rod to core faults of delinquents. Damian,” he continued, the Jew to our presence.”

The squire departed with a profound reverence, and in minutes returned, marshalling in Isaac of York.
ked slave, ushered into the presence of some mighty
could approach his judgment-seat with more pro-
reverence and terror than that with which the Jew
ear to the presence of the Grand Master. When he approached within the distance of three yards, Beau-
made a sign with his staff that he should come no

The Jew knelt down on the earth, which he
in token of reverence; then rising, stood before the ars, his hands folded on his bosom, his head bowed
breast, in all the submission of Oriental slavery.
 Damian,” said the Grand Master, “retire, and have a ready to await our sudden call; and suffer no one to the garden until we shall leave it.” The squire
and retreated. “Jew,” continued the haughty old
mark me. It suits not our condition to hold with ong communication, nor do we waste words or time

HEARING, ETC. SEE PSALMS XVIII. 44.
IVANHOE

in any one. Wherefore be brief in thy answers to what questions I shall ask thee, and let thy words be of truth; if thy tongue doubles with me, I will have it torn from thy unbelieving jaws.”

The Jew was about to reply; but the Grand Master interposed:

“Peace, unbeliever! not a word in our presence, save answer to our questions. What is thy business with brother Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”

Isaac gasped with terror and uncertainty. To tell his tale might be interpreted into scandalising the order; unless he told it, what hope could he have of achieving his daughter’s deliverance? Beaumanoir saw his mortification, and condescended to give him some assurance.

“Fear nothing,” he said, “for thy wretched person so thou dealest uprightly in this matter. I demand to know from thee thy business with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”

“I am bearer of a letter,” stammered out the Jew, “I have a letter from my reverend valour, to that good knight, Prior Aymer of the Abbey of Jorvaulx.”

“Said I not these were evil times, Conrade?” said the Master. “A Cistercian prior sends a letter to a man at the Temple, and can find no more fitting messenger than an unbelieving Jew. Give me the letter.”

The Jew, with trembling hands, undid the caps of the Armenian cap, in which he had deposited the letts for the greater security, and was about to hand extended and body crouched, to pluck the reach of his grim interrogator.

“Back, dog!” said the Grand Master; “I want the letter from the Jew and give it to me.”

Beaumanoir, being thus possessed of the pack-thread which secured its twin letter discreetly examined the outside carefully, and then proceeded to open it.
"said Conrade, interposing, though with much mance, "wilt thou break the seal?"
and will I not?" said Beaumanoir, with a frown. "Is written in the forty-second capital, De Lectione Lit-ta, 1 that a Templar shall not receive a letter, no, not his father, without communicating the same to the Master, and reading it in his presence?"
then perused the letter in haste, with an expression
prise and horror; read it over again more slowly;
olding it out to Conrade with one hand, and slightly
g it with the other, exclaimed: "Here is goodly stuff Christian man to write to another, and both mem-and no inconsiderable members, of religious profes-
When," said he solemnly, and looking upward,
Thou come with Thy fanners to purge the thrashing-Fitchet took the letter from his superior, and out to peruse it. "Read it aloud, Conrade," said and Master; "and do thou (to Isaac) attend to the rt of it, for we will question thee concerning it."
rade read the letter, which was in these words:
er, by divine grace, prior of the Cistercian house of ary’s of Jorvaulx, to Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, a of the holy order of the Temple, wisheth health, de bounties of King Bacchus and of my Lady Venus.
ing our present condition, dear brother, we are a
in the hands of certain lawless and godless men, ave not feared to detain our person, and put us to
; whereby we have also learned of Front-de-Bœuf’s une, and that thou hast escaped with that fair Jeweress whose black eyes have bewitched thee. We artily rejoiced of thy safety; nevertheless, we pray to be on thy guard in the matter of this second Witch for we are privately assured that your Great

I V A N H O E

1 Lectione Literarum. "On the reading of letters."
2 Thou, etc. See Luke III. 17.
Master, who careth not a bean for cherry cheeks and black eyes, comes from Normandy to diminish your mirth and amend your misdoings. Wherefore we pray you heartily to beware, and to be found watching, even as the Holy Text hath it, Inveniuntur vigilantes.\(^1\) And the wealthy Jew her father, Isaac of York, having prayed of me letters in his behalf, I gave him these, earnestly advising, and in a sort entreating, that you do hold the damsel to ransom, seeing he will pay you from his bags as much as may find fifty damsels upon safer terms, whereof I trust to have my part when we make merry together, as true brothers, not forgetting the wine-cup. For what saith the text, Vineum lactificant cor hominis;\(^2\) and again, Rex delectabitur pulchritudine tua.\(^3\)

"Till which merry meeting, we wish you farewell. Given from this den of thieves, about the hour of matins;

"AYMER PR. S. M. JORVOLCIENCI.

"Postscriptum.—Truly your golden chain hath not long abidden with me, and will now sustain, around the neck of an outlaw deer-stealer, the whistle wherewith he calleth on his hounds."

"What sayest thou to this, Conrade?" said the Grand Master. "Den of thieves! and a fit residence is a den of thieves for such a prior. No wonder that the hand of God is upon us, and that in the Holy Land we lose place by place, foot by foot, before the infidels, when we have such churchmen as this Aymer. And what meaneth he, I trow, by 'this second Witch of Endor'?" said he to his confidant, something apart.

Conrade was better acquainted, perhaps by practice, with the jargon of gallantry than was his superior; and he expounded the passage which embarrassed the Grand Mas-

\(^1\) Inveniuntur vigilantes. See Luke XII. 37.
\(^2\) Vineum, etc. "Wine maketh glad the heart of man." See Psalms CX. 10.
\(^3\) Rex, etc. "The king shall delight in thy beauty." See Psalms 33. 19.
be a sort of language used by worldly men towards whom they loved par amours; but the explanation satisfy the bigoted Beaumanoir.

There is more in it than thou dost guess, Conrade; complicity is no match for this deep abyss of wickedness.
This Rebecca of York was a pupil of that Miriam of whom thou hast heard. Thou shalt hear the Jew own it now.” Then turning to Isaac, he said aloud, “Thy er, then, is prisoner with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?”
y, reverend valorous sir,” stammered poor Isaac, whatever ransom a poor man may pay for her de-scape!” said the Grand Master. “This thy daughter practised the art of healing, hath she not?”

ly, gracious sir,” answered the Jew, with more confi-and knight and yeoman, squire and vassal, may the goodly gift which Heaven hath assigned to her.
One can testify that she hath recovered them by her own every other human aid hath proved vain; but blessing of the God of Jacob was upon her.”

Beaumanoir turned to Mont-Fitchet with a grim smile. brother,” he said, “the deceptions of the devouring
! Behold the baits with which he fishes for souls, a poor space of earthly life in exchange for eternal ness hereafter. Well said our blessed rule, Semper atur leo vorans.\(^1\) Upon the lion! Down with the er!” said he, shaking aloft his mystic abacus, as if ance of the powers of darkness. “Thy daughter h the cures, I doubt not,” thus he went on to address w, “by words and sigils, and periaps,\(^2\) and other tical mysteries.”

ay, reverend and brave knight,” answered Isaac, chief measure by a balsam of marvellous virtue.”
here had she that secret?” said Beaumanoir.

---

\(^1\) The ravening lion is ever to be beaten down.

\(^2\) And periaps. Seals and charms.
"It was delivered to her," answered Isaac, reluctantly, "by Miriam, a sage matron of our tribe."

"Ah, false Jew!" said the Grand Master; "was it not from that same witch Miriam, the abomination of whose enchantments have been heard of throughout every Christian land?" exclaimed the Grand Master, crossing himself.

"Her body was burnt at a stake, and her ashes were scattered to the four winds; and so be it with me and mine order, if I do not as much to her pupil, and more also! I will teach her to throw spell and incantation over the soldiers of the blessed Temple! There, Damian, spurn this Jew from the gate; shoot him dead if he oppose or turn again. With his daughter we will deal as the Christian law and our own high office warrant."

Poor Isaac was hurried off accordingly, and expelled from the preceptory, all his entreaties, and even his offers, unheard and disregarded. He could do no better than return to the house of the Rabbi, and endeavour, through his means, to learn how his daughter was to be disposed of. He had hitherto feared for her honour; he was now to tremble for her life. Meanwhile, the Grand Master ordered to his presence the preceptor of Templestowe.
CHAPTER XXXVI

Say not my art is fraud—all live by seeming.
The beggar begs with it, and the gay courtier
Gains land and title, rank and rule, by seeming;
The clergy scorn it not, and the bold soldier
Will eke with it his service.—All admit it,
All practice it; and he who is content
With showing what he is shall have small credit
In church, or camp, or state. So wags the world.
Old Play.

Albert Malvoisin, president, or, in the language of the er, preceptor of the establishment of Templestowe, was ther to that Philip Malvoisin who has been already occaally mentioned in this history, and was, like that baron, lose league with Brian de Bois-Guilbert.
Amongst dissolute and unprincipled men, of whom the iple order included but too many, Albert of Temple-we might be distinguished; but with this difference from audacious Bois-Guilbert, that he knew how to throw his vices and his ambition the veil of hypocrisy, and to ume in his exterior the fanaticism which he internally ised. Had not the arrival of the Grand Master been so expectedly sudden, he would have seen nothing at emplestowe which might have appeared to argue any re-tion of discipline. And, even although surprised, and ertain extent detected, Albert Malvoisin listened with h respect and apparent contrition to the rebuke of his erior, and made such haste to reform the particulars he ured—succeeded, in fine, so well in giving an air of ctic devotion to a family which had been lately devoted cense and pleasure, that Lucas Beaumanoir began to entertain a higher opinion of the preceptor's morals than the first appearance of the establishment had inclined him to adopt.

But these favourable sentiments on the part of the Grand Master were greatly shaken by the intelligence that Albert had received within a house of religion the Jewish captive, and, as was to be feared, the paramour of a brother of the order; and when Albert appeared before him he was regarded with unwonted sternness.

"There is in this mansion, dedicated to the purposes of the holy order of the Temple," said the Grand Master, in a severe tone, "a Jewish woman, brought hither by a brother of religion, by your connivance, Sir Preceptor."

Albert Malvoisin was overwhelmed with confusion; but the unfortunate Rebecca had been confined in a remote and secret part of the building, and every precaution used to prevent her residence there from being known. He read in the looks of Beaumanoir ruin to Bois-Guilbert and to himself, unless he should be able to avert the impending storm.

"Why are you mute?" continued the Grand Master.

"Is it permitted to me to reply?" answered the prece-tor, in a tone of the deepest humility, although by the question he only meant to gain an instant's space for arranging his ideas.

"Speak, you are permitted," said the Grand Master—
"speak, and say, knowest thou the capital of our holy rule:
De commilitonibus Templi in sancta civistate, qui cum mis-errimis mulieribus versantur, propter oblectionem carnis?" 1

"Surely, most reverend father," answered the preceptor.
"I have not risen to this office in the order, being ignorant of one of its most important prohibitions."

"How comes it, then, I demand of thee once more, that thou hast suffered a brother to bring a paramour, and that

1 De COMMILITONIBUS, etc. The edict which he quotes is against co-munon with women of light character. [Scott.]
ur a Jewish sorceress, into this holy place, to the
and pollution thereof?"
Jewish sorceress!” echoed Albert Malvoisin, “good guard us!”
brother, a Jewish sorceress,” said the Grand Mas-truly, “I have said it. Darest thou deny that this a, the daughter of that wretched usurer Isaac of and the pupil of the foul witch Miriam, is now—to be thought or spoken!—lodged within this thy ory?”
our wisdom, reverend father,” answered the precep-
th rolled away the darkness from my understanding.
lid I wonder that so good a knight as Brian de Bois-et seemed so fondly besotted on the charms of this whom I received into this house merely to place a wixt their growing intimacy, which else might have mented at the expense of the fall of our valiant and is brother.”
with nothing, then, as yet passed betwixt them in
of his vow?” demanded the Grand Master.
hat! under this roof?” said the preceptor, crossing
; “St. Magdalene and the ten thousand virgins for-ho! if I have sinned in receiving her here, it was in ing thought that I might thus break off our brother’s devotion to this Jewess, which seemed to me so unnatural, that I could not but ascribe it to some of insanity, more to be cured by pity than reproof.
ance your reverend wisdom hath discovered this Jew-1 to be a sorceress, perchance it may account fully enamoured folly.”
doth!—it doth!” said Beaumanoir. “See, brother he, the peril of yielding to the first devices and blan-nts of Satan! We look upon woman only to gratify of the eye, and to take pleasure in what men call her and the Ancient Enemy, the devouring lion, obtains

An abandoned woman.
power over us, to complete, by talisman and spell, a work which was begun by idleness and folly. It may be that our brother Bois-Guilbert does in this matter deserve rather pity than severe chastisement, rather the support of the saint than the strokes of the rod; and that our admonitions and prayers may turn him from his folly, and restore him to his brethren.”

“It were deep pity,” said Conrade Mont-Fitchet, “to lose to the order one of its best lances, when the holy community most requires the aid of its sons. Three hundred Saracens hath this Brian de Bois-Guilbert slain with his own hand.”

“The blood of these accursed dogs,” said the Grand Master, “shall be a sweet and acceptable offering to the saints and angels whom they despise and blaspheme; and with their aid will we counteract the spells and charms with which our brother is entwined as in a net. He shall burst the bands of this Delilah as Samson burst the two new cords with which the Philistines had bound him, and shall slaughter the infidels, even heaps upon heaps. But concerning this foul witch, who hath flung her enchantments over a brother of the Holy Temple, assuredly she shall die the death.”

“But the laws of England——” said the preceptor, who though delighted that the Grand Master’s resentment, thus fortunately averted from himself and Bois-Guilbert, had taken another direction, began now to fear he was carrying it too far.

“The laws of England,” interrupted Beaumanoir, “permit and enjoin each judge to execute justice within his own jurisdiction. The most petty baron may arrest, try, and condemn a witch found within his own domain. And shall that power be denied to the Grand Master of the Temple within a preceptory of his order? No! we will judge and condemn. The witch shall be taken out of the land, and the wickedness thereof shall be forgiven. Prepare the castle hall for the trial of the sorceress.”
Albert Malvoisin bowed and retired, not to give direct a for preparing the hall, but to seek out Brian de Bois-bert, and communicate to him how matters were likely termine. It was not long ere he found him, foaming indignation at a repulse he had anew sustained from fair Jewess. "The unthinking," he said—"the unhelpful, to scorn him who, amidst blood and flames, would gave her life at the risk of his own! By Heaven, Malvoisin! I abode until roof and rafters crackled and crashed and me. I was the butt of a hundred arrows; they fell on mine armour like hailstones against a latticed ment, and the only use I made of my shield was for her tection. This did I endure for her, and now the self-
ed girl upbraids me that I did not leave her to perish,
refuses me not only the slightest proof of gratitude, but the most distant hope that ever she will be brought to any. The devil, that possessed her race with ob-cy, has concentrated its full force in her single person!"
"The devil," said the preceptor, "I think, possessed you?
How oft have I preached to you caution, if not conience? Did I not tell you that there were enough willing sian damsels to be met with, who would think it sin to se so brave a knight le don d'amoureux merci,¹ and you needs anchor your affection on a wilful, obstinate Jew-

By the mass, I think old Lucas Beaumanoir guesses
it, when he maintains she hath cast a spell over you."
"Lucas Beaumanoir?" said Bois-Guilbert, reproachfully.
these your precautions, Malvoisin? Hast thou suf-the dotard to learn that Rebecca is in the preceptory?"
How could I help it?" said the preceptor. "I neglected
ing that could keep secret your mystery; but it is be-
ed, and whether by the devil or no, the devil only can

But I have turned the matter as I could; you are safe renounce Rebecca. You are pitied—the victim of

Don D'Amoureux Merci. "The generous gift of love."
magical delusion. She is a sorceress, and must suffer such."

"She shall not, by Heaven!" said Bois-Guilbert.

"By Heaven, she must and will!" said Malvoisin.

"Neither you nor any one else can save her. Lucas de Beaumanoir hath settled that the death of a Jewess will sin-offering sufficient to atone for all the amorous incursions of the Knights Templars; and thou knowest he both the power and will to execute so reasonable and a purpose."

"Will future ages believe that such stupid bigotry existed!" said Bois-Guilbert, striding up and down the apartment.

"What they may believe, I know not," said Malvoisin calmly; "but I know well, that in this our day, clerks, laymen, take ninety-nine to the hundred, will cry 'Amen' to the Grand Master's sentence."

"I have it," said Bois-Guilbert. "Albert, thou art my friend. Thou must connive at her escape, Malvoisin, I will transport her to some place of greater security.

"I cannot, if I would," replied the preceptor: "the mission is filled with the attendants of the Grand Master, others who are devoted to him. And, to be frank with brother, I would not embark with you in this matter, even I could hope to bring my bark to haven. I have riches enough already for your sake. I have no mind to encumber a sentence of degradation, or even to lose my preceptorship. I might have the sake of a painted piece of Jewish flesh and blood. you, if you will be guided by my counsel, will give up wild-goose chase, and fly your hawk at some other Think, Bois-Guilbert; thy present rank, thy future honours all depend on thy place in the order. Shouldst thou act perversely to thy passion for this Rebecca, thou wilt Beaumanoir the power of expelling thee, and he will neglect it. He is jealous of the truncheon which rembling gripe, and he knows thou stretchest thy hand towards it. Doubt not he will ruin thee, if thou let him a pretext so fair as thy protection of a Jewish girl. Give him his scope in this matter, for thou canst not suit thine own humour."

"Malvoisin," said Bois-Guilbert, "thou art a cold-blooded friend," said the preceptor, hastening to fill up the blank which Bois-Guilbert would probably have placed a word—"a cold-blooded friend I am, and therefore I tell thee once more, that I must not save Rebecca. I tell thee once more, thou hast perished with her. Go hie thee to the Grand Master himself at his feet and tell him—""

"hie thee to his feet, by Heaven! but to the dotard's very feet I say—"

"to him, then, to his beard," continued Malvoisin, "that you love this captive Jewess to distraction; the more thou dost enlarge on thy passion, the greater is thy haste to end it by the death of the fair enemy; while thou, taken in flagrant delicto by the murder of a crime contrary to thine oath, canst hope no aid from rethren, and must exchange all thy brilliant visions of passion and power, to lift perhaps a mercenary spear in the petty quarrels between Flanders and Bur-} ou speakest the truth, Malvoisin," said Brian de Gilbert, after a moment's reflection. "I will give the bigot no advantage over me; and for Rebecca, she merited at my hand that I should expose rank and for her sake. I will cast her off; yes, I will leave her fate, unless—"

Malvoisin (in flagrante delicto). "In the very commission of the crime."
Malvoisin; “women are but the toys which amuse our lighter hours; ambition is the serious business of life. Perish a thousand such frail baubles as this Jewess, before thy manly step pause in the brilliant career that lies stretched before thee! For the present we part, nor must we be seen to hold close conversation; I must order the hall for his judgment seat.”

“What!” said Bois-Guilbert, “so soon?”

“Ay,” replied the preceptor, “trial moves rapidly on when the judge has determined the sentence beforehand.”

“Rebecca,” said Bois-Guilbert, when he was left alone, “thou art like to cost me dear. Why cannot I abandon thee to thy fate, as this calm hypocrite recommends? One effort will I make to save thee; but beware of ingratitude! for, if I am again repulsed, my vengeance shall equal my love. The life and honour of Bois-Guilbert must not be hazarded, where contempt and reproaches are his only reward.”

The preceptor had hardly given the necessary orders when he was joined by Conrade Mont-Fitchet, who acquainted him with the Grand Master’s resolution to bring the Jewess to instant trial for sorcery.

“It is surely a dream,” said the preceptor; “we have many Jewish physicians, and we call them not wizards, though they work wonderful cures.”

“The Grand Master thinks otherwise,” said Mont-Fitchet; “and, Albert, I will be upright with thee: wizard or not, it were better that this miserable damsel die than that Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be lost to the order, or the order divided by internal dissension. Thou knowest his high rank, his fame in arms; thou knowest the zeal with which many of our brethren regard him; but all this will not avail him with our Grand Master, should he consider Brian as the accomplice, not the victim, of this Jewess. Were the souls of the twelve tribes in her single body, it were better she suffered alone than that Bois-Guilbert were partner in her destruction.”
I have been working him even now to abandon her,” said Malvoisin; “but still, are there grounds enough to condemn this Rebecca for sorcery? Will not the Grand Master change his mind when he sees that the proofs are so weak?”

They must be strengthened, Albert,” replied Montfitchet—“they must be strengthened. Dost thou understand me?”

I do,” said the preceptor, “nor do I scruple to do aught advancement of the order; but there is little time to engage fitting.”

Malvoisin, they must be found,” said Conrade; “well it advantage both the order and thee. This Temple is a poor preceptory; that of Maison-Dieu is worth two-thirds its value. Thou knowest my interest with our old masters; find those who can carry this matter through, and make a preceptor of Maison-Dieu in the fertile Kent. sayst thou?”

There is,” replied Malvoisin, “among those who came over with Bois-Guilbert, two fellows whom I well know; and they were to my brother Philip de Malvoisin, and from his service to that of Front-de-Bœuf. It may be they know something of the witcheries of this woman.”

Away, seek them out instantly; and hark thee, if a hint or two will sharpen their memory, let them not be loth to proceed. They would swear the mother that bore them a sorcerer. or a zechin,” said the preceptor.

Away, then,” said Mont-Fitchet; “at noon the affair will proceed. I have not seen our senior in such earnest consultation since he condemned to the stake Hamet Alfagi, a convert who relapsed to the Moslem faith.”

The ponderous castle-bell had tolled the point of noon, and Rebecca heard a trampling of feet upon the private, which led to her place of confinement. The noise announced the arrival of several persons, and the circumstance rather gave her joy; for she was more afraid of solitary visits of the fierce and passionate Bois-Guérin than of any evil that could befall her besides. The door of the chamber was unlocked, and Conrade and the prévôt Malvoisin entered, attended by four warders clothed in black, and bearing halberds.

Maison-Dieu. The name of the preceptory means "House of God."

"Daughter of an accursed race!" said the prévôt, "arise and follow us."

"Whither," said Rebecca, "and for what purpose?"

"Damsel," answered Conrade, "it is not for thee to question, but to obey. Nevertheless, be it known to thee that thou art to be brought before the tribunal of the Grand Master of our holy order, there to answer for thy offences."

"May the God of Abraham be praised!" said Rebecca, folding her hands devoutly; "the name of a judge, an enemy to my people, is to me as the name of a prophet. Most willingly do I follow thee; permit me only to wear a veil around my head."

They descended the stair with slow and solemn step, traversed a long gallery, and, by a pair of folding-doors placed at the end, entered the great hall in which the Grand Master had for the time established his court of justice.

The lower part of this ample apartment was filled by squires and yeomen, who made way, not without some difficulty, for Rebecca, attended by the preceptor and Fitchet, and followed by the guard of halberdiers, to a seat forward to the seat appointed for her. As she passed through the crowd, her arms folded and her head depressed, a scrap of paper was thrust into her hand, which she received almost unconsciously, and continued to hold without examining its contents. The assurance that she possessed some friend in this awful assembly gave her courage to look around, and to mark into whose presence she had been conducted. She gazed, accordingly, upon the scene, which shall endeavour to describe in the next chapter.
CHAPTER XXXVII

Stern was the law which bade its vot’ries leave
At human woes with human hearts to grieve;
Stern was the law, which at the winning wile
Of frank and harmless mirth forbade to smile;
But sterner still, when high the iron rod
Of tyrant power she shook, and call’d that power of God.

The Middle Ages.

The tribunal, erected for the trial of the innocent and appy Rebecca, occupied the dais or elevated part of the end of the great hall—a platform which we have ady described as the place of honour, destined to be upied by the most distinguished inhabitants or guests of ancient mansion.

On an elevated seat, directly before the accused, sat the nd Master of the Temple, in full and ample robes of ing white, holding in his hand the mystic staff which the symbol of the order. At his feet was placed a e, occupied by two scribes, chaplains of the order, whose y it was to reduce to formal record the proceedings of day. The black dresses, bare scalps, and demure looks hese churchmen formed a strong contrast to the warlike earance of the knights who attended, either as residing he preceptory or as come thither to attend upon their nd Master. The preceptors, of whom there were four cent, occupied seats lower in height and somewhat drawn k behind that of their superior; and the knights who eyed no such rank in the order were placed on benches lower, and preserving the same distance from the preors as these from the Grand Master. Behind them, but upon the dais or elevated portion of the hall, stood the res of the order, in white dresses of an inferior quality.
The whole assembly wore an aspect of the most found gravity; and in the faces of the knights might be received traces of military daring, united with the solemn riage becoming men of a religious profession, and while the presence of their Grand Master, failed not to sit every brow.

The remaining and lower part of the hall was filled guards, holding partizans, and with other attendants of curiosity had drawn thither to see at once a Grand Ma and a Jewish sorceress. By far the greater part of inferior persons were, in one rank or other, connected the order, and were accordingly distinguished by their dresses. But peasants from the neighbouring country not refused admittance; for it was the pride of Beaum render the edifying spectacle of the justice which administered as public as possible. His large blue seemed to expand as he gazed around the assembly, and countenance appeared elated by the conscious dignity imaginary merit of the part which he was about to per
A psalm, which he himself accompanied with a deep voice, which age had not deprived of its powers, commen
the proceedings of the day; and the solemn sounds, Vi exultemus Domino,1 so often sung by the Templars by engaging with earthly adversaries, was judged by most appropriate to introduce the approaching triumph such he deemed it, over the powers of darkness. The prolonged notes, raised by a hundred masculine voices customed to combine in the choral chant, arose to vaulted roof of the hall, and rolled on amongst its with the pleasing yet solemn sound of the rushing of night waters.

When the sounds ceased, the Grand Master glanced eye slowly around the circle, and observed that the sea
one of the preceptors was vacant. Brian de Bois-Guil by whom it had been occupied, had left his pace, &c.
w standing near the extreme corner of one of the benches occupied by the knights companions of the Temple, one and extending his long mantle, so as in some degree to hide his face; while the other held his cross-handled sword, with the point of which, sheathed as it was, he was slowly drawing lines upon the oaken floor.

"Unhappy man!" said the Grand Master, after favouring him with a glance of compassion. "Thou seest, Conrade, this holy work distresses him. To this can the light look of woman, aided by the Prince of the Powers of this world, bring a valiant and worthy knight! Seest thou he cannot look upon us; he cannot look upon her; and who shows by what impulse from his tormentor his hand forms these cabalistic lines upon the floor? It may be our life and liberty are thus aimed at; but we spit at and defy the foul enemy. Semper Leo percutiatur! 1

This was communicated apart to his confidential follower, Conrade Mont-Fitchet. The Grand Master then raised his voice and addressed the assembly.

"Reverend and valiant men, knights, preceptors, and companions of this holy order, my brethren and my children! you also, well-born and pious esquires, who aspire to bear this Holy Cross! and you also, Christian brethren, of every degree!—be it known to you, that it is not defect of power in us which hath occasioned the assembling of this congregation; for, however unworthy in our person, yet is committed, with this baton, full power to judge and try all that regards the weal of this our holy order. Holy Bernard, in the rule of our knightly and religious profession, hath said, in the fifty-ninth capital, 2 that he would that brethren be called together in council, save at the command of the Master; leaving it free to us, as to see more worthy fathers who have preceded us in this our

Semper Leo, etc. "Ever let the lion be beaten down."

CAPITAL. The reader is again referred to the Rules of the Poor Military

Heresy of the Temple, which occur in the Works of St. Bernard. Scott.) office, to judge as well of the occasion as of the time and place in which a chapter of the whole order, or of any part thereof, may be convoked. Also, in all such chapters, it is our duty to hear the advice of our brethren, and to proceed according to our own pleasure. But when the raging wolf hath made an inroad upon the flock, and carried off one member thereof, it is the duty of the kind shepherd to call his comrades together, that with bows and slings they may quell the invader, according to our well-known rule, that the lion is ever to be beaten down. We have therefore summomed to our presence a Jewish woman, by name Rebecca, daughter of Isaac of York—a woman infamous for sortileges and for witcheries; whereby she hath maddened the blood, and besotted the brain, not of a churl, but of a knight; not of a secular knight, but of one devoted to the service of the Holy Temple; not of a knight companion, but of a preceptor of our order, first in honour as in place. Our brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, is well known to ourse-learner, and to all degrees who now hear me, as a true and zealous champion of the Cross, by whose arm many deeds of valor have been wrought in the Holy Land, and the holy place purified from pollution by the blood of those infidels who defiled them. Neither have our brother’s sagacity and re-dence been less in repute among his brethren than his our and discipline; insomuch that knights, both in eastern and western lands, have named de Bois-Guilbert as one who may well be put in nomination as successor to this baton when it shall please Heaven to release us from the toil of bearing it. If we were told that such a man, so honourable, and so honourable, suddenly casting away regard for his character, his vows, his brethren, and his prospects, be-associated to himself a Jewish damsel, wandered in lewd company through solitary places, defended her per-in preference to his own, and, finally, was so utterly blinded and besotted by his folly, as to bring her even to one of us, ceptories, what should we say but that the noble was possessed by some evil demon, or influenced by a icked spell? If we could suppose it otherwise, think valour, high repute, or any earthly consideration, prevent us from visiting him with punishment, that thing might be removed, even according to the text, malum ex vobis. For various and heinous are the transgression against the rule of our blessed order amentable history. 1st, He hath walked according proper will, contrary to capital 33, Quod nullus junto voluntatem incedat. 2d, He hath held communi-with an excommunicated person, capital 57, Ut non participant cum excommunicatis, and therefore portion in Anathema Maranatha. 3d, He hath conwith strange women, contrary to the capital, Ut non conversantur cum extraneis mulieribus. 4th,
h not avoided, nay, he hath, it is to be feared, the kiss of woman, by which, saith the last rule of owned order, Ut fugiantur oscula, the soldiers of the re brought into a snare. For which heinous and died guilt, Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be cut off out from our congregation, were he the right hand
t eye thereof.”

paused. A low murmur went through the assembly.
of the younger part, who had been inclined to smile at ute, De osculis fugiendis, became now grave enough, owned the Grand Master was next to ch,” he said, “and so great should indeed be the pun-

RE, nullus, etc. “Put away the evil from you.” See Deuteronomy XIII. 5.
RE, nullus, etc. “That no one shall walk according to his own will.”
THEMES, etc. “That the brethren shall hold no intercourse with united.”
THEMES, etc. “That the brethren should not hold intercourse with omen.”
TANTER, etc. “That kissing should be shunned.”
ULIS, etc. “Of the shunning of kisses.”
ishment of a Knight Templar who wilfully offended against the rules of his order in such weighty points. But means of charms and of spells, Satan had obtained minion over the knight, perchance because he cast his too lightly upon a damsels’s beauty, we are then rather lament than chastise his backsliding; and, imposing only such penance as may purify him from his iniquity are to turn the full edge of our indignation upon the cursed instrument, which had so well-nigh occasioned utter falling away. Stand forth, therefore, and bear ness, ye who have witnessed these unhappy doings, may judge of the sum and bearing thereof; and it whether our justice may be satisfied with the punishment this infidel woman, or if we must go on, with a blet heart, to the further proceeding against our brother.”

Several witnesses were called upon to prove the ris which Bois-Guilbert exposed himself in endeavouring save Rebecca from the blazing castle, and his neglect of personal defence in attending to her safety. The merits these details with the exaggerations common to minds which have been strongly excited by any remark event, and their natural disposition to the marvellous greatly increased by the satisfaction which their evi seemed to afford to the eminent person for whose infin ition it had been delivered. Thus the dangers which Bois Guilbert surmounted, in themselves sufficiently great, came portentous in their narrative. The devotion of knight to Rebecca’s defence was exaggerated beyond bounds not only of discretion, but even of the most fr excess of chivalrous zeal; and his deference to what she even although her language was often severe and upbraid ing, was painted as carried to an excess which, in a man his haughty temper, seemed almost preternatural.

The preceptor of Templestowe was then called to describe the manner in which Bois-Guilbert and the Jes arrived at the preceptory. The evidence of Malvois ly guarded. But while he apparently studied to the feelings of Bois-Guilbert, he threw in, from time
e, such hints as seemed to infer that he laboured some temporary alienation of mind, so deeply did he be enamoured of the damsel whom he brought with him. With sighs of penitence, the preceptor his own contrition for having admitted Rebecca and never within the walls of the preceptory. "But my dehe concluded, "has been made in my confession to most reverend father the Grand Master; he knows my were not evil, though my conduct may have been far. Joyfully will I submit to any penance he shall
me."
hou hast spoken well, brother Albert," said Beauc; "thy motives were good, since thou didst judge it
to arrest thine erring brother in his career of precipi-tly. But thy conduct was wrong; as he that would runaway steed, and seizing by the stirrup instead of idle, receiveth injury himself, instead of accomplis-true purpose. Thirteen paternosters are assigned by our founder for matins, and nine for vespers; be those doubled by thee. Thrice a-week are Templars per-the use of flesh; but do thou keep fast for all the days. This do for six weeks to come, and thy pens accomplished."
with a hypocritical look of the deepest submission, the ator of Templestowe bowed to the ground before his or, and resumed his seat.
ere it not well, brethren," said the Grand Master,
we examine something into the former life and condon of this woman, specially that we may discover
her she be one likely to use magical charms and spells,
the truths which we have heard may well incline us to se that in this unhappy course our erring brother has acted upon by some infernal enticement and delu-
Herman of Goodalricke was the fourth preceptor present; the other three were Conrade, Malvoisin, and Bois-Guilbert himself. Herman was an ancient warrior, whose face was marked with scars inflicted by the sabre of the Moslemah, and had great rank and consideration among his brethren. He arose and bowed to the Grand Master, who instantly granted him license of speech. "I would crave to know, most reverend father, of our valiant brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, what he says to these wondrous accusations, and with what eye he himself now regards his unhappy intercourse with this Jewish maiden?"

"Brian de Bois-Guilbert," said the Grand Master, "then hearest the question which our brother of Goodalricke desirest thou shouldst answer. I command thee to reply to him."

Bois-Guilbert turned his head towards the Grand Master when thus addressed, and remained silent.

"He is possessed by a dumb devil," said the Grand Master. "Avoid thee, Sathanas! Speak, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, I conjure thee, by this symbol of our holy order."

Bois-Guilbert made an effort to suppress his rising scorn and indignation, the expression of which, he was well aware, would have little availed him. "Brian de Bois-Guilbert," he answered, "replies not, most reverend father, to such wild and vague charges. If his honour be impeached, will defend it with his body, and with that sword which he often fought for Christendom."

"We forgive thee, brother Brian," said the Grand Master; "though that thou hast boasted thy warlike achievements before us is a glorifying of thine own deeds, and cometh of the Enemy, who tempteth us to exalt our own worship. But thou hast our pardon, judging thou speakest less of thine own suggestion than from the impulse of him whom, by Heaven's leave, we will quell and drive forth from our assembly." A glance of disdain flashed from the fierce eyes of Bois-Guilbert, but he made no reply. "Thou pursued the Grand Master, "since our brother of Wicke's question has been thus imperfectly answered, we our quest, brethren, and with our patron's assistance will search to the bottom this mystery of iniquity. those who have ought to witness of the life and conversion of this Jewish woman stand forth before us."

Here was a bustle in the lower part of the hall, and the Grand Master inquired the reason, it was replied, as in the crowd a bedridden man, whom the prisoner adored to the perfect use of his limbs, by a miraculous poor peasant, a Saxon by birth, was dragged for the bar, terrified at the penal consequences which he have incurred by the guilt of having been cured of a Jewish damsel. Perfectly cured he certainly was, for he supported himself forward on crutches to the throne. Most unwilling was his testimony, and with many tears; but he admitted that two years when residing at York, he was suddenly afflicted with disease, while labouring for Isaac the rich Jew, in his house of a joiner; that he had been unable to stir from the remedies applied by Rebecca's directions, especially a warming and spicy-smelling balsam, had in due time restored him to the use of his limbs. Moreover, she had given him a pot of that precious ointment and furnished him with a piece of money withal, to go to the house of his father, near to Templestowe.

"Say it please your gracious reverence," said the man, not think the damsel meant harm by me, though she ill hap to be a Jewess; for even when I used her I said the pater and the creed, and it never oper-nor did I offer it to her, but she said, 'I am not a Jewess.'"

"Nay, slave," said the Grand Master, "and begone! suits brutes like thee to be tampering and trinketing devilish cures, and to be giving your labour to the sons of your own fathers. I tell thee, the fiend can impose diseases for..."
the very purpose of removing them, in order to bring into credit some diabolical fashion of cure. Hast thou that unguent of which thou speakest?"

The peasant, fumbling in his bosom with a trembling hand, produced a small box, bearing some Hebrew characters on the lid, which was, with most of the audience, a sure proof that the devil had stood apothecary. Beaumanoir, after crossing himself, took the box into his hand, and, learned in most of the Eastern tongues, read with ease the motto on the lid: "The Lion of the Tribe of Judah hath conquered." "Strange powers of Sathanas," said he,
"which can convert Scripture into blasphemy, mingling poison with our necessary food! Is there no leech here who can tell us the ingredients of this mystic unguent?"

Two mediciners, as they called themselves, the one a monk, the other a barber, appeared, and avouched they knew nothing of the materials, excepting that they sa-oured of myrrh and camphire, which they took to be Orital herbs. But with the true professional hatred to a successful practitioner of their art, they insinuated that, since the medicine was beyond their own knowledge, it must necessarily have been compounded from an unlawful and magical pharmacopoeia; since they themselves, though conjurors, fully understood every branch of their art, so as it might be exercised with the good faith of a Christian.
When this medical research was ended, the Saxon peasant desired humbly to have back the medicine which he had found so salutary; but the Grand Master frowned severely at the request. "What is thy name, fellow?" said he to the cripple.

"Higg, the son of Snell," answered the peasant.

"Then, Higg, son of Snell," said the Grand Master, "I tell thee, it is better to be bedridden than to accept the ben-fit of unbelievers' medicine that thou mayest arise and walk; better to despoil infidels of their treasure by the strug-
than to accept of them benevolent gifts, or do them ice for wages. Go thou, and do as I have said.”

“Alack,” said the peasant, “an it shall not displease your rence, the lesson comes too late for me, for I am but a ned man; but I will tell my two brethren, who serve the Rabbi Nathan Ben Samuel, that your mastership it is more lawful to rob him than to render him faith-service.”

“Out with the prating villain!” said Beaumanoir, who not prepared to refute this practical application of his eral maxim.

Higg, the son of Snell, withdrew into the crowd, but, rested in the fate of his benefactress, lingered until he d learn her doom, even at the risk of again encounter-the frown of that severe judge, the terror of which ered his very heart within him.

At this period of the trial, the Grand Master comced Rebecca to unveil herself. Opening her lips for first time, she replied patiently, but with dignity, at it was not the wont of the daughters of her people cover their faces when alone in an assembly of ngers.” The sweet tones of her voice, and the softness her reply, impressed on the audience a sentiment of pity sympathy. But Beaumanoir, in whose mind the sup-ion of each feeling of humanity which could interfere his imagined duty was a virtue of itself, repeated his mands that his victim should be unveiled. The ords were about to remove her veil accordingly, when stood up before the Grand Master, and said, “Nay, but the love of your own daughters—alas,” she said, recoling herself, “ye have no daughters!—yet for the remem-ce of your mothers, for the love of your sisters, and of ale decency, let me not be thus handled in your prese; it suits not a maiden to be disrobéd by such rude oms. I will obey you,” she added, with an expression of patient sorrow in her voice, which had almost melted the heart of Beaumanoir himself; "ye are elders among people, and at your command I will show the features of the ill-fated maiden."

She withdrew her veil, and looked on them with a tenance in which bashfulness contended with dignity, exceeding beauty excited a murmur of surprise, and younger knights told each other with their eyes, in correspondence, that Brian's best apology was in the mode of her real charms, rather than of her imaginary witch. But Higg, the son of Snell, felt most deeply the effect produced by the sight of the countenance of his benefactor. "Let me go forth," he said to the warders at the door of the hall—"let me go forth! To look at her again with me, for I have had a share in murdering her."

"Peace, poor man," said Rebecca, when she heard the exclamation; "thou hast done me no harm by speaking the truth; thou canst not aid me by thy complaints or lamentations. Peace, I pray thee; go home and save thyself.

Higg was about to be thrust out by the warders, who were apprehensive lest his clamorous words should draw upon them reprehension, and upon his persons punishment. But he promised to be silent, and was permitted to remain. The two men-at-arms, with which Albert Malvoisin had not failed to communicate upon the import of their testimony, were now called for. Though both were hardened and inflexible villains, there was no sight of the captive maiden, as well as one of her excellencies, who appeared at first to stagger them; but an expressive look from the preceptor of Templestowe restored them to dogged composure; and they delivered, with a most which would have seemed suspicious to more impartial judges, circumstances either altogether fictitious or and natural in themselves, but rendered pregnant with the sinister commentary which the witnesses..."
The circumstances of their evidence would have been, in modern days, divided into two classes—those which are immaterial, and those which were actually and physically impossible. But both were, in those ignorant and superstitious times, easily credited as proofs of guilt. The first class set forth that Rebecca was heard to mutter to herself in an unknown tongue; that the songs she sung by fits were of a strangely sweet sound, which made the ears of the hearer tingle and his heart throb; that she spoke at times to herself, and seemed to look upward for a reply; that her garments were of a strange and mystic form, unlike those of women of good repute; that she had rings impressed with cabalistical devices, and that strange characters were brodered on her veil. All these circumstances, natural and so trivial, were gravely listened to as proofs, at least as affording strong suspicions, that Rebecca had lawful correspondence with mystical powers.

But there was less equivocal testimony, which the credulity of the assembly, or of the greater part, greedily swallowed, however incredible. One of the soldiers had seen work a cure upon a wounded man brought with them from the castle of Torquilstone. "She did," he said, "make certain signs upon the wound, and repeated certain mysterious words, which he blessed God he understood not, when the iron head of a square cross-bow bolt disengaged itself from the wound, the bleeding was stanched, the wound was closed, and the dying man was, within the quarter of an hour, walking upon the ramparts, and assisting the wight in managing a mangonel, or machine for hurling stones." This legend was probably founded upon the fact that Rebecca had attended on the wounded Ivanhoe when he was at the castle of Torquilstone. But it was the more difficult to dispute the accuracy of the witness, as, in order to prove real evidence in support of his verbal testimony, he plucked from his pouch the very bolt-head which, according to his story, had been miraculously extracted from the wound; and as the iron weighed a full ounce, it completely confirmed the tale, however marvellous.

His comrade had been a witness from a neighboring battlement of the scene betwixt Rebecca and Bois-Guérin when she was upon the point of precipitating herself from the top of the tower. Not to be behind his companion, this fellow stated that he had seen Rebecca perch herself on the parapet of the turret, and there take the form of a white swan, under which appearance she flitted three times round the castle of Torquilstone; then again settle on the turret, and once more assume the female form.

Less than one-half of this weighty evidence would have been sufficient to convict any old woman, poor and even though she had not been a Jewess. United with this one fatal circumstance, the body of proof was too weighty for Rebecca’s youth, though combined with the most exquisite beauty.

The Grand Master had collected the suffrages, and in a solemn tone demanded of Rebecca what she had to say against the sentence of condemnation which he was about to pronounce.

“To invoke your pity,” said the lovely Jewess, with a voice somewhat tremulous with emotion, “would be in vain; I would not, be as useless as I should hold it mean. To ask that to relieve the sick and wounded of another race cannot be displeasing to the acknowledged Founder of our faiths, were also unavailing; to plead, that my things which these men—who may Heaven pardon me—have spoken against me are impossible, would avail me but little, since you believe in their possibility; and still would it advantage me to explain that the peculiarities of my dress, language, and manners are those of my people. I had well-nigh said of my country, but, alas! we have no country. Nor will I even vindicate myself at the expense of my oppressor, who stands there listening to the fables and surmises which seem to convert the tyrant...”
God be judge between him and me! but rather I submit to ten such deaths as your pleasure may injure against me than listen to the suit which that man has urged upon me—friendless, defenseless, and prisoner. But he is of your own faith, and his lightest ance would weigh down the most solemn protestations of the distressed Jewess. I will not therefore return to my charge but me; but to myself—Brian de Bois-Guilbert, to thyself I appeal, whether accusations are not false? as monstrous and calumni-sional they are deadly?"

there was a pause; all eyes turned to Brian de Bois-
He was silent.

Speak,” she said, “if thou art a man; if thou art a man, speak! I conjure thee, by the habit which thou wear—by the name thou dost inherit—by the knight-thou dost vaunt—by the honour of thy mother—by the bond and the bones of thy father—I conjure thee to trust these things true?”

Answer her, brother,” said the Grand Master, “if the with whom thou dost wrestle will give thee power.”

fact, Bois-Guilbert seemed agitated by contending ions, which almost convulsed his features, and it was a constrained voice that at last he replied, looking to

: “The scroll!—the scroll!”

ay,” said Beaumanoir, “this is indeed testimony!
victim of her witcheries can only name the fatal scroll, fell inscribed on which is, doubtless, the cause of his

at Rebecca put another interpretation on the words, red as it were from Bois-Guilbert, and glancing her on the slip of parchment which she continued to hold her hand, she read written thereupon in the Arabian ster, “Demand a champion!” The murmuring country which ran through the assembly at the strange of Bois-Guilbert gave Rebecca leisure to examin
and instantly to destroy the scroll unobserved. When whisper had ceased, the Grand Master spoke.

"Rebecca, thou canst derive no benefit from the evidence of this unhappy knight, for whom, as we well receive, the Enemy is yet too powerful. Hast thou or else to say?"

"There is yet one chance of life left to me," said Rebecca, "even by your own fierce laws. Life has been miserable—miserable, at least, of late—but I will not cast aside the gift of God while He affords me the means of defending it. I deny this charge; I maintain my innocence, and declare the falsehood of this accusation. I challenge the privilege of trial by combat, and will appear by my champion."

"And who, Rebecca," replied the Grand Master, "lay lance in rest for a sorceress? who will be the champion of a Jewess?"

"God will raise me up a champion," said Rebecca. cannot be that in merry England, the hospitable, the generous, the free, where so many are ready to peril their lives for honour, there will not be found one to fight for justice. But it is enough that I challenge the trial by combat: this lies my gage."

She took her embroidered glove from her hand, and flung it down before the Grand Master, with an air mingled simplicity and dignity which excited universal surprise and admiration.
CHAPTER XXXVIII

There I throw my gage,
To prove it on thee to the extremest point
Of martial daring.

Richard II.

When Lucas Beaumanoir himself was affected by the appearance of Rebecca. He was not originally or even a severe man; but with passions by nature and with a high, though mistaken, sense of duty, his had been gradually hardened by the ascetic life which issued, the supreme power which he enjoyed, and the necessity of subduing infidelity and eradicating which he conceived peculiarly incumbent on him.
atures relaxed in their usual severity as he gazed upon beautiful creature before him, alone, unfriended, and ring herself with so much spirit and courage. He himself twice, as doubting whence arose the un-softening of a heart which on such occasions used emble in hardness the steel of his sword. At length ke.

"Mamsel," he said, "if the pity I feel for thee arise from actice thine evil arts have made on me, great is thy
But I rather judge it the kinder feelings of nature, grieves that so goodly a form should be a vessel of
. Repent, my daughter, confess thy witchcrafts, ete from thine evil faith, embrace this holy emblem,
I shall yet be well with thee here and hereafter. In isterhood of the strictest order shalt thou have time ayer and fitting penance, and that repentance not to ented of. This do and live: what has the law of done for thee that thou shouldst die for it?"

509
"It was the law of my fathers," said Rebecca; "it was delivered in thunders and in storms upon the mountain of Sinai, in cloud and in fire. This, if ye are Christians, ye believe. It is, you say, recalled; but so my teachers have not taught me."

"Let our chaplain," said Beaumanoir, "stand forth, and tell this obstinate infidel——"

"Forgive the interruption," said Rebecca meekly; "I am a maiden, unskilled to dispute for my religion; but I can die for it, if it be God's will. Let me pray your answer to my demand of a champion."

"Give me her glove," said Beaumanoir. "This is indeed," he continued, as he looked at the flimsy texture and slender fingers, "a slight and frail gage for a purpose so deadly! Seest thou, Rebecca, as this thin and light glove of thine is to one of our heavy steel gauntlets, so is thy cause to that of the Temple, for it is our order which thou hast defied."

"Cast my innocence into the scale," answered Rebecca, "and the glove of silk shall outweigh the glove of iron."

"Then thou dost persist in thy refusal to confess thy guilt, and in that bold challenge which thou hast made?"

"I do persist, noble sir," answered Rebecca.

"So be it then, in the name of Heaven," said the Grand Master; "and may God show the right!"

"Amen," replied the preceptors around him, and the word was deeply echoed by the whole assembly.

"Brethren," said Beaumanoir, "you are aware that we might well have refused to this woman the benefit of the trial by combat; but, though a Jewess and an unbeliever, she is also a stranger and defenceless, and God forbid that she should ask the benefit of our mild laws and that it should be refused to her. Moreover, we are knights and soldiers as well as men of religion, and shame it were to us, upon any pretence, to refuse proffered combat. Therefore, stands the case. Rebecca, the daughter of York, is, by many frequent and suspicious circumstances, famed of sorcery practiced on the person of a noble knight of our holy order, and hath challenged the combat in proof of her innocence. To whom, reverend brethren, is it our opinion that we should deliver the gage of battle, naming him, at the same time, to be our champion on the field?"

"To Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whom it chiefly concerns," said the preceptor of Goodalricke, "and who, moreover, best knows how the truth stands in this matter."

"But if," said the Grand Master, "our brother Brian under the influence of a charm or a spell—we speak for the sake of precaution, for to the arm of none of our holy order would we more willingly confide this or a more weighty cause."

"Reverend father," answered the preceptor of Goodalricke, "no spell can affect the champion who comes forward to fight for the judgment of God."

"Thou sayest right, brother," said the Grand Master. Malvoisin, give this gage of battle to Brian de Bois-Guilbert. It is our charge to thee, brother," he continued, addressing himself to Bois Guilbert, "that thou do thy battle manfully, nothing doubting that the good cause shall triumph. And do thou, Rebecca, attend, that we assign thee the third day from the present to find a champion."

"That is but brief space," answered Rebecca, "for a stranger, who is also of another faith, to find one who will battle, wagering life and honour for her cause, against a knight who is called an approved soldier."

"We may not extend it," answered the Grand Master; the field must be foughten in our presence, and divers mighty causes call us on the fourth day from hence."

"God's will be done!" said Rebecca; "I put my trust in him, to whom an instant is as effectual to save as a whole month."

"Thou hast spoken well, damsel," said the Grand Master.
Master; "but well know we who can array himself like an angel of light. It remains but to name a fitting place for combat, and, if it so hap, also of execution. Where is the preceptor of this house?"

Albert Malvoisin, still holding Rebecca’s glove in hand, was speaking to Bois-Guilbert very earnestly, in a low voice.

"How!" said the Grand Master, "will he not receive a challenge?"

"He will—he doth, most reverend father," said Malvoisin, slipping the glove under his own mantle. "And in the place of combat, I hold the fittest to be the lists of George belonging to this preceptory, and used by us in military exercise."

"It is well," said the Grand Master. "Rebecca, in the lists shall thou produce thy champion; and if thou fail to do so, or if thy champion shall be discomfited by judgment of God, thou shalt then die the death of a sinner, according to doom. Let this our judgment be recorded and the record read aloud that no one may pretend ignorance."

One of the chaplains who acted as clerks to the char, immediately engrossed the order in a huge volume, which contained the proceedings of the Templar Knights solemnly assembled on such occasions; and when he finished writing, the other read aloud the sentence of the Grand Master, which, when translated from the Norman French in which it was couched, was expressed as follows:

"Rebecca, a Jewess, daughter of Isaac of York, be attainted of sorcery, seduction, and other damnable practices, practised on a knight of the most holy order of the Temple of Zion, doth deny the same, and saith that her testimony delivered against her this day is false, wicked, and disloyal; and that by lawful essoine1 of her body, as

---

1 Essoine. Essoine signifies excuse, and here relates to the privilege of appearing by her champion, in excuse of her own account of her sex. [Scott.]
ble to combat in her own behalf, she doth offer, by permission instead thereof, to avouch her case, he performs loyal devoir in all knightly sort, with such arms of battle do fully appertain, and that at her peril. And therewith she proffered her gage. And the thing being delivered to the noble lord and knight, the Bois-Guilbert, of the holy order of the Temple of the was appointed to do this battle in behalf of his said himself, as injured and impaired by the practices appellant. Wherefore the most reverend father and lord, Lucas Marquis of Beaumanoir, did allow of the challenge, and of the said essoine of the appellant's and assigned the third day for the said combat, the ing the inclosure called the lists of St. George, near receptory of Templestowe. And the Grand Master ed the appellant to appear there by her champion, of doom, as a person convicted of sorcery or secon the defendant so to appear, under the pen-being held and adjudged recreant in case of default; noble lord and most reverend father aforesaid ap the battle to be done in his presence, and according that is commendable and profitable in such a case. by God aid the just cause!" then!" said the Grand Master; and the word was by all around. Rebecca spoke not, but she looked heaven, and, folding her hands, remained for a min without change of attitude. She then modestly re the Grand Master that she ought to be permitted portunity of free communication with her friends, purpose of making her condition known to them, curing, if possible, some champion to fight in her s just and lawful," said the Grand Master; "choose messenger thou shalt trust, and he shall have free ica tion with thee in thy prison-chamber." “Is there,” said Rebecca, “any one here who, either for love of a good cause or for ample hire, will do the errand of a distressed being?”

All were silent; for none thought it safe, in the presence of the Grand Master, to avow any interest in the calumni-ated prisoner, lest he should be suspected of leaning towards Judaism. Not even the prospect of reward, far less any feelings of compassion alone, could surmount this apprehension.

Rebecca stood for a few moments in indescribable anxiety, and then exclaimed, “Is it really thus? And in English land am I to be deprived of the poor chance of safety which remains to me, for want of an act of charity which would not be refused to the worst criminal?”

Higg, the son of Snell, at length replied, “I am but a maimed man, but that I can at all stir or move was owing to her charitable assistance. I will do thine errand,” he added, addressing Rebecca, “as well as a crippled object can, and happy were my limbs fleet enough to repair the mischief done by my tongue. Alas! when I boasted of thy charity, I little thought I was leading thee into danger!”

“God,” said Rebecca, “is the disposer of all. He can turn back the captivity of Judah, even by the weakest instrument. To execute his message the snail is as sure a messenger as the falcon. Seek out Isaac of York—here is that will pay for horse and man—let him have this scroll.
I know not if it be of Heaven the spirit which inspires me.
but most truly do I judge that I am not to die this death, and that a champion will be raised up for me. Farewell!
Life and death are in thy haste.”

The peasant took the scroll, which contained only a few lines in Hebrew. Many of the crowd would have dissuaded him from touching a document so suspicious; but Higg was resolute in the service of his benefactress. “She has saved his body,” he said, “and he was confident she did not mean to peril his soul.”
I will get me,” he said, “my neighbour Buthan’s good i, and I will be at York within as brief space as man beast may.”

But, as it fortuned, he had no occasion to go so far, for in a quarter of a mile from the gate of the preceptory net with two riders, whom, by their dress and their yellow caps, he knew to be Jews; and, on approaching nearly, discovered that one of them was his ancient loyer Isaac of York. The other was the Rabbi Benuel; and both had approached as near to the precept as they dared, on hearing that the Grand Master had moned a chapter for the trial of a sorceress.

“Brother Ben Samuel,” said Isaac, “my soul is distrest, and I wot not why. This charge of necromancy is not often used for cloaking evil practices on our people.”

“Be of good comfort, brother,” said the physician; on canst deal with the Nazarenes as one possessing the common of unrighteousness, and canst therefore purchase unity at their hands; it rules the savage minds of those godly men, even as the signet of the mighty Solomon said to command the evil genii. But what poor wretch hes hither upon his crutches, desiring, as I think, some leech of me? Friend,” continued the physician, address-Higg, the son of Snell, “I refuse thee not the aid of the art, but I relieve not with one asper those who beg alms upon the highway. Out upon thee! Hast thou palsy in thy legs? then let thy hands work for thy livelihood; for, albeit thou be’st unfit for a speedy post, or for duteous shepherd, or for the warfare, or for the service of thy master, yet there be occupations— How now, her?” said he, interrupting his harangue to look to Isaac, who had but glanced at the scroll which Higg read, when, uttering a deep groan, he fell from his mule a dying man, and lay for a minute insensible.

1. H. Horse; in a more limited sense, work-horse. [Scott.]
2. NIL. Compare Robert Browning’s Abt Vogler.
3. T. A Turkish coin worth less than a cent.
The Rabbi now dismounted in great alarm, and applied the remedies which his art suggested for the ury of his companion. He had even taken from his a cupping apparatus, and was about to proceed to pomy, when the object of his anxious solicitude revived; but it was to dash his cap from his head, throw dust on his grey hairs. The physician was inclined to ascribe this sudden and violent emotion effects of insanity; and, adhering to his original py, began once again to handle his implements. But soon convinced him of his error.

"Child of my sorrow," he said, "well shouldst called Benoni, instead of Rebecca! Why should the bring down my grey hairs to the grave, till, in the b of my heart, I curse God and die."

"Brother," said the Rabbi, in great surprise, "a father in Israel, and dost thou utter words like these? I trust that the child of thy house yet liveth."

"She liveth," answered Isaac; "but it is as Dan was called Belteshazzar, even when within the deions. She is captive unto those men of Belial, and will wreak their cruelty upon her, sparing neither youth nor her comely favour. Oh! she was as a green palms to my grey locks; and she must with night, like the gourd of Jonah! Child of my love of my old age!—oh, Rebecca, daughter of Rachel darkness of the shadow of death hath encompassed t"

"Yet read the scroll," said the Rabbi; "peradvent may be that we may yet find out a way of deliveran"

"Do thou read, brother," answered Isaac, "for me are as a fountain of water."

The physician read, but in their native langu followin words:

"To Isaac, the son of Adonikam, whom the Gentil Isaac of York, peace and the blessing of the pe

1 BENONI. The Hebrew name means "child of ano means "captivating," "delightsome." See Genesis XXXX, 12 Itliplied unto thee! My father, I am as one doomed to for that which my soul knoweth not, even for the crime witchcraft. My father, if a strong man can be found do battle for my cause with sword and spear, according the custom of the Nazarenes, and that within the lists Templestowe, on the third day from this time, peradvento our fathers' God will give him strength to defend the ocent, and her who hath none to help her. But if this y not be, let the virgins of our people mourn for me as one cast off, and for the hart that is stricken by the inter, and for the flower which is cut down by the scythe the mower. Wherefore look now what thou doest, and ether there be any rescue. One Nazarene warrior might bead bear arms in my behalf, even Wilfred, son of Cedric, rom the Gentiles call Ivanhoe. But he may not yet ure the weight of his armour. Nevertheless, send the ings unto him, my father; for he hath favour among strong men of his people, and as he was our companion
the house of bondage, he may find some one to do battle y sake. And say unto him—even unto him—even to Wilfred, the son of Cedric, that if Rebecca live, or if becca die, she liveth or dieth wholly free of the guilt she arged withal. And if it be the will of God that thou ult be deprived of thy daughter, do not thou tarry, old
, in this land of bloodshed and cruelty; but betake thy-to Cordova, where thy brother liveth in safety, under shadow of the throne, even of the throne of Boabdil the acen; for less cruel are the cruelties of the Moors unto race of Jacob than the cruelties of the Nazarenes of land."

Isaac listened with tolerable composure while Ben uel read the letter, and then again resumed the ures and exclamations of Oriental sorrow, tearing his ents, be sprinkling his head with dust, and ejaculating, daughter! my daughter! flesh of my flesh, and bone of bone!"
"Yet," said the Rabbi, "take courage, for this availleth nothing. Gird up thy loins, and seek out Wilfred, the son of Cedric. It may be he will help with counsel or with strength; for the youth hath favor in the eyes of Richard, called of the Nazarenes Coeur-de-Lion, and the tidings that he hath returned are constant in the land. It may be that he may obtain his letter, and signet, commanding these men of blood, who take name from the Temple to the dishonour thereof, that proceed not in their purposed wickedness."

"I will seek him out," said Isaac, "for he is a youth, and hath compassion for the exile of Jacob. He cannot bear his armour, and what other Christian do battle for the oppressed of Zion?"

"Nay, but," said the Rabbi, "thou speakest as one knoweth not the Gentiles. With gold shalt thou buy valour, even as with gold thou buyest thine own soul. Be of good courage, and do thou set forward to find out Wilfred of Ivanhoe. I will also up and be doing, for sin it were to leave thee in thy calamity. I will hire the city of York, where many warriors and strong men assembled, and doubt not I will find among them some who will do battle for thy daughter; for gold is their bond and for riches will they pawn their lives as well as lands. Thou wilt fulfil, my brother, such promise as I make unto them in thy name?"

"Assuredly, brother," said Isaac, "and Heaven praised that raised me up a comforter in my misery! Be it, grant them not their full demand at once, for shalt find it the quality of this accursed people that will ask pounds, and peradventure accept of ours. Nevertheless, be it as thou willest, for I am distracted this thing, and what would my gold avail me if the end of my love should perish?"

"Farewell," said the physician, "and may it wishes as thy heart desireth."
They embraced accordingly, and departed on their several roads. The crippled peasant remained for some time haggling after them.

"These dog Jews!" said he; "to take no more notice of ee guild-brother than if I were a bond slave or a Turk, a circumcised Hebrew like themselves! They might e flung me a mancus or two, however. I was not ged to bring their unhallowed scrawls, and run the risk of being bewitched, as more folks than one told me. And at care I for the bit of gold that the wench gave me, if n to come to harm from the priest next Easter at con- ion, and be obliged to give him twice as much to make up with him, and be called the Jews' flying post all my e, as it may hap, into the bargain? I think I was be- ched in earnest when I was beside that girl! But it always so with Jew or Gentile, whosoever came near e none could stay when she had an errand to go; and l, whenever I think of her, I would give shop and tools ave her life."

Mancus. An Anglo-Saxon coin worth about sixty cents
CHAPTER XXXIX

O maid, unrelenting and cold as thou art,
My bosom is proud as thine own. Seward.

It was in the twilight of the day when her trial, if it could be called such, had taken place, that a low knock was heard at the door of Rebecca’s prison-chamber. It disturbed not the inmate, who was then engaged in the evening prayer recommended by her religion, and which concluded with a hymn we have ventured thus to translate into English:

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out of the land of bondage came,
Her fathers’ God before her moved,
An awful guide, in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonish’d lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia’s crimson’d sands
Return’d the fiery column’s glow.

There rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answer’d keen
And Zion’s daughters pour’d their lays,
With priest’s and warrior’s voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wanders lone;
Our fathers would not know Thy ways,
And Thou hast left them to their own.

But, present still, though now unseen,
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of These a cloudy screen
To temper the deceitful ray.
And oh, when stoops on Judah’s path
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be Thou, long-suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning and a shining light.

520
Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn;
No censer round our altar beams,
And mute our timbrel, trump, and horn.
But Thou hast said, The blood of goat,
The flesh of rams, I will not prize;
A contrite heart, an humble thought,
Are Mine accepted sacrifice.

Then the sounds of Rebecca's devotional hymn had wax in silence, the low knock at the door was again
ed. "Enter," she said, "if thou art a friend; and me, I have not the means of refusing thy entrance."

"I am," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, entering the apart-friend or foe, Rebecca, as the event of this interview
make me."

armed at the sight of this man, whose licentious pasthe considered as the root of her misfortunes, Rebecca backward with a cautious and alarmed, yet not a us, demeanour into the farthest corner of the apart-
as if determined to retreat as far as she could, but to
her ground when retreat became no longer possible.
rew herself into an attitude not of defiance, but of ion, as one that would avoid provoking assault, yet
solute to repel it, being offered, to the utmost of her

you have no reason to fear me, Rebecca," said the he fear; "or, if I must so qualify my speech, you have
now no reason to fear me."

fear you not, Sir Knight," replied Rebecca, although ort-drawn breath seemed to belie the heroism of her
; "my trust is strong, and I fear thee not."

you have no cause," answered Bois-Guilbert, gravely;
former frantic attempts you have not now to dread.

your call are guards over whom I have no authority.
are designed to conduct you to death, Rebecca, yet
not suffer you to be insulted by any one, even by me,
y frenzy—for frenzy it is—to urge me so far."
“May heaven be praised!” said the Jewess; “death is least of my apprehensions in this den of evil.”

“Ay,” replied the Templar, “the idea of death is easily received by the courageous mind, when the road to it is sudden and open. A thrust with a lance, a stroke with a sword, were to me little; to you, a spring from a dizzy battlement, a stroke with a sharp poniard, has no terrors, compared with what either thinks disgrace. Mark me—I say this—perhaps mine own sentiments of honour are not less fantastic, Rebecca, than thine are; but we know alike how to die for them.”

“Unhappy man,” said the Jewess; “and art thou condemned to expose thy life for principles of which thy own judgment does not acknowledge the solidity? Surely this is a parting with your treasure for that which is not bread. But deem not so of me. Thy resolution may fluctuate with the wild and changeful billows of human opinion; but mine is anchored on the Rock of Ages.”

“Silence, maiden,” answered the Templar; “such course now avails but little. Thou art condemned to a sudden and easy death, such as misery chooses, despair welcomes, but a slow, wretched, protracted torture, suited to what the diabolical bigotry of men calls thy crime.”

“And to whom—if such my fate—to whom do this?” said Rebecca; “surely only to him who, for selfish and brutal cause, dragged me hither, and with some unknown purpose of his own, strives to expose the wretched fate to which he exposed me.”

“Think not,” said the Templar, “that I have so theee; I would have bucklered thee against such with my own bosom, as freely as ever I exposed safts which had otherwise reached thy life.”

“Had thy purpose been the honourable protection the innocent,” said Rebecca, “I had thanked thee care; as it is, thou hast claimed merit for it
ee life is worth nothing to me, preserved at the
ich thou wouldst exact for it.”
ce with thine upbraidings, Rebecca,” said the Tem-have my own cause of grief, and brook not that oaches should add to it.”
at is thy purpose, then, Sir Knight?” said the “speak it briefly. If thou hast aught to do save to the misery thou hast caused, let me know it; and so it please you, leave me to myself. The step time and eternity is short but terrible, and I have ments to prepare for it.”
ceive, Rebecca,” said Bois-Guilbert, “that thou tinue to burden me with the charge of distresses ost fain would I have prevented.”
Knight,” said Rebecca, “I would avoid reproaches; t is more certain than that I owe my death to thine d passion?”
a err—you err,” said the Templar, hastily, “if you what I could neither foresee nor prevent to my pur-
age. Could I guess the unexpected arrival of ard, whom some flashes of frantic valour, and the yielded by fools to the stupid self-torments of an have raised for the present above his own merits, commmon sense, above me, and above the hundreds of er who think and feel as men free from such silly tastic prejudices as are the grounds of his opinions ons?”
t,” said Rebecca, “you sate a judge upon me; innoost innocent—as you knew me to be, you concurred ondemnation; and if I aright understood, are your-appear in arms to assert my guilt, and assure my ment.”
y patience, maiden,” replied the Templar. “No ows so well as thine own tribes how to submit to the d so to trim their bark as to make advantage even erse wind.”
"Lamented be the hour," said Rebecca, "that has taught me such art to the House of Israel! but adversity bends the heart as fire bends the stubborn steel, and those who are no longer their own governors, and the denizens of their own free independent state, must crouch before strait. It is our curse, Sir Knight, deserved, doubtless, by our misdeeds and those of our fathers; but you—you who have your freedom as your birthright, how much deeper is the disgrace when you stoop to soothe the prejudices of others and that against your own conviction?"

"Your words are bitter, Rebecca," said Bois-Guilbert, pacing the apartment with impatience, "but I came hither to bandy reproaches with you. Know that I Guilbert yields not to created man, although circumstances may for a time induce him to alter his plan. His with the mountain stream, which may indeed be turned into a little space aside by the rock, but fails not to find its course to the ocean. That scroll which warned thee to demand a champion, from whom couldst thou think it came, if not from Bois-Guilbert? In whom else couldst thou have cited such interest?"

"A brief respite from instant death," said Rebecca, "which will little avail me. Was this all thou couldst do? one on whose head thou hast heaped sorrow, and whom thou hast brought near even to the verge of the tomb?"

"No, maiden," said Bois-Guilbert, "this was not all that I purposed. Had it not been for the accursed interference of yon fanatical dotard, and the fool of Goodalricke, who, being a Templar, affects to think and judge according to the ordinary rules of humanity, the office of the champion and defender had devolved, not on a preceptor, but on a companion of the order. Then I myself—such was my purpose—and, on the sounding of the trumpet, appeared in the lists as thy champion, disguised indeed in the fashion of a roving knight, who seeks adventures to prove his skill and spear; and then, let Beaumanoir have chosen an two or three of the brethren here assembled, I had doubted to cast them out of the saddle with my single e. Thus, Rebecca, should thine innocence have been ched, and to thine own gratitude would I have trusted e reward of my victory."

This, Sir Knight," said Rebecca, "is but idle boasting brag of what you would have done had you not found convenient to do otherwise. You received my glove, my champion, if a creature so desolate can find one, to encounter your lance in the lists; yet you would me the air of my friend and protector!"

Thy friend and protector," said the Templar, gravely, ill yet be; but mark at what risk, or rather at what cer- ty, of dishonour; and then blame me not if I make my ations before I offer up all that I have hitherto held , to save the life of a Jewish maiden."

Speak," said Rebecca; "I understand thee not."

Well, then," said Bois-Guilbert, "I will speak as freely er did doting penitent to his ghostly father, when ed in the tricky confessional. Rebecca, if I appear not these lists I lose fame and rank—lose that which is the th of my nostrils, the esteem, I mean, in which I am by my brethren, and the hopes I have of succeeding hat mighty authority which is now wielded by the dotard Lucas de Beaumanoir, but of which I should e a far different use. Such is my certain doom, except pear in arms against thy cause. Accursed be he of aricke, who baited this trap for me! and doubly ured Albert de Malvoisin, who withheld me from the ution I had formed of hurling back the glove at the of the superstitious and superannuated fool who lis- d to a charge so absurd, and against a creature so high ind and so lovely in form as thou art!"

And what now avails rant or flattery?" answered ecca. "Thou hast made thy choice between causing to ed the blood of an innocent woman, or of endangering thine own earthly state and earthly hopes. What aw to reckon together; thy choice is made.”

“No, Rebecca,” said the knight, in a softer tone drawing nearer towards her, “my choice is not made mark, it is thine to make the election. If I appear lists, I must maintain my name in arms; and if I en championed or unchampioned, thou diest by the stake faggot, for there lives not the knight who hath coped me in arms on equal issue or on terms of vantage.
Richard Cœur-de-Lion and his minion of Ivanhoe.
ho, as thou well knowest, is unable to bear his corslet Richard is in a foreign prison. If I appear, thou en although thy charms should instigate some hot-blooded youth to enter the lists in thy defence.”

“And what avails repeating this so often?” said Re

“Much,” replied the Templar; “for thou must leave look at thy fate on every side.”

“Well, then, turn the tapestry,” said the Jewess, le let me see the other side.”

“If I appear,” said Bois-Guilbert, “in the fatal thou diest by a slow and cruel death, in pain such as say is destined to the guilty hereafter. But if I am not, then am I a degraded and dishonoured knight, ac of witchcraft and of communion with infidels: the not trious name which has grown yet more so under my war becomes a hissing and a reproach. I lose fame—I ho honour—I lose the prospect of such greatness as em emperors attain to; I sacrifice mighty ambition—I dis schemes built as high as the mountains with which he say their heaven was once nearly scaled; and yet, Rebe
he added, throwing himself at her feet, “this greatness
I sacrifice—this fame will I renounce—this power wi forego, even now when it is half within my grasp, if t wilt say, ‘Bois-Guilbert, I receive thee for my lover.’

“Think not of such foolishness, Sir Knight,” was Rebecca, “but hasten to the Regent, the Queen Y to Prince John; they cannot, in honour to the English own, allow of the proceedings of your Grand Master. So I you give me protection without sacrifice on your part,
the pretext of requiring any requital from me."
"With these I deal not," he continued, holding the train her robe—"it is thee only I address; and what can coun-ance thy choice? Bethink thee, were I a fiend, yet
th is a worse, and it is death who is my rival."
"I weigh not these evils," said Rebecca, afraid to pro-e the wild knight, yet equally determined neither to ure his passion nor even feign to endure it. "Be a
, be a Christian! If indeed thy faith recommends that rcy which rather your tongues than your actions pred, save me from this dreadful death, without seeking a ual which would change thy magnanimity into base-
ter."
"No, damsel!" said the proud Templar, springing up, ou shalt not thus impose on me: if I renounce present re and future ambition, I renounce it for thy sake, and ill escape in company. Listen to me, Rebecca," he , again softening his tone; "England—Europe—is not world. There are spheres in which we may act, ampleough even for my ambition. We will go to Palestine, Conrade Marquis of Montserrat is my friend—a free as myself from the doting scruples which fetter free-born reason: rather with Saladin will we league elves than endure the scorn of the bigots whom we
mn. I will form new paths to greatness," he con-ed, again traversing the room with hasty strides;
ope shall hear the loud step of him she has driven her sons! Not the millions whom her crusaders send ughter can do so much to defend Palestine; not the es of the thousands and ten thousands of Saracens can their way so deep into that land for which nations are ing, as the strength and policy of me and those brethren in despite of yonder old bigot, will adhere to me in good and evil. Thou shalt be a queen, Rebecca: on Mount Carmel shall we pitch the throne which my valour gain for you, and I will exchange my long-desired baton a sceptre!"

"A dream," said Rebecca—"an empty vision of night, which, were it a waking reality, affects me. Enough, that the power which thou mightest acquire I never share; nor hold I so light of country or religious as to esteem him who is willing to barter these ties, and away the bonds of the order of which he is a sworn member in order to gratify an unruly passion for the daughter of other people. Put not a price on my deliverance, Knight—sell not a deed of generosity—protect the pressed for the sake of charity, and not for a selfish advantage. Go to the throne of England; Richard will listen to my appeal from these cruel men."

"Never, Rebecca!" said the Templar, fiercely. "If renounce my order, for thee alone will I renounce it. Ambition shall remain mine, if thou refuse my love: I will be fooled on all hands. Stoop my crest to Richard?—a boon of that heart of pride? Never, Rebecca, will I place the order of the Temple at his feet in my person. I will forsake the order; I never will degrade or betray it."

"Now God be gracious to me," said Rebecca, "for the succour of man is wellnigh hopeless!"

"It is indeed," said the Templar; "for, proud as thou art, thou hast in me found thy match. If I enter the with my spear in rest, think not any human consideration shall prevent my putting forth my strength; and think thine own fate—to die the dreadful death of the vassal of criminals—to be consumed upon a blazing pile—dispersed to the elements of which our strange forms are mystically composed—not a relic left of that grace frame, from which we could say this lived and moved. Rebecca, it is not in woman to sustain this pressure—the wilt yield to my suit."
“Bois-Guilbert,” answered the Jewess, “thou knowest the heart of woman, or hast only conversed with those who are lost to her best feelings. I tell thee, proud Templar, that not in thy fiercest battles hast thou displayed less of thy vaunted courage than has been shown by man when called upon to suffer by affection or duty. In myself a woman, tenderly nurtured, naturally fearful of danger, and impatient of pain; yet, when we enter those lists, thou to fight and I to suffer, I feel the strong assurance within me that my courage shall mount higher in thine. Farewell. I waste no more words on thee; time that remains on earth to the daughter of Jacob be otherwise spent: she must seek the Comforter, who hide His face from His people, but who ever opens His ear to the cry of those who seek Him in sincerity and in truth.”

“We part then thus?” said the Templar, after a short se; “would to Heaven that we never met, or that thou hadst been noble in birth and Christian in faith! Nay, by heaven! when I gaze on thee, and think when and how we next to meet, I could even wish myself one of thine degraded nation; my hand conversant with ingots and seals, instead of spear and shield; my head bent down over each petty noble, and my look only terrible to the erring and bankrupt debtor—this could I wish, Rebecca, be near to thee in life, and to escape the fearful share thou hast in thy death.”

“Thou hast spoken the Jew,” said Rebecca, “as the portion of such as thou art has made him. Heaven in ire driven him from his country, but industry has opened him the only road to power and to influence which ression has left unbarred. Read the ancient history of people of God, and tell me if those by whom Jehovah thought such marvels among the nations were then a peas for misers and of usurers! And know, proud knight, we ber names amongst us to which your boasted northern nobility is as the gourd compared with the cedar—names that ascend far back to those high times when the Divine Presence shook the mercy-seat between the cherubim, and which derive their splendour from no earthly prince, but from the awful Voice which bade their fathers be nearest of the congregation to the Vision. Such were the princes of the House of Jacob."

Rebecca’s colour rose as she boasted the ancient glories of her race, but faded as she added, with a sigh: “Such were the princes of Judah, now such no more! They are trampled down like the shorn grass, and mixed with the mire of the ways. Yet are there those among them who shame not such high descent, and of such shall be the daughter of Isaac the son of Adonikam! Farewell! I envy not thy blood-won honours; I envy not thy barbarous descent from Northern heathens; I envy thee not thy faith, which is ever in thy mouth but never in thy heart nor in thy practice.”

“There is a spell on me, by Heaven!” said Bois-Guilbert. “I almost think yon besotted skeleton spoke the truth, and that the reluctance with which I part from thee hath something in it more than is natural. Fair creature!” he said, approaching nearer, but with great respect. “So young, so beautiful, so fearless of death! and yet doomed to die, and with infamy and agony. Who would not weep for thee? The tear, that has been a stranger to these eyelids for twenty years, moistens them as I gaze on thee. But it must be—nothing may now save thy life. Thou and I are but the blind instruments of some irresistible fatality that hurries us along, like goodly vessels driving before the storm, which are dashed against each other, and so perish. Forgive me, then, and let us part at least as friends part. I have assailed thy resolution in vain, and mine own is fixed as the adamantine decrees of fate.”

“Thus,” said Rebecca, “do men throw on fate the fire of their own wild passions. But I do forgive thee, booz Fortunately, the author of my early death. There are e things which cross over thy powerful mind; but it is garden of the sluggard, and the weeds have rushed up, conspired to choke the fair and wholesome blossom."
"Yes," said the Templar, "I am, Rebecca, as thou hast en me, untaught, untamed; and proud that, amidst a of empty fools and crafty bigots, I have retained the eminent fortitude that places me above them. I have child of battle from my youth upward, high in my ess, steady and inflexible in pursuing them. Such must I in—proud, inflexible, and unchanging; and of this world shall have proof. But thou forgivest me, becca?"
"As freely as ever victim forgave her executioner."
"Farewell, then," said the Templar, and left the apart-t.
The preceptor Albert waited impatiently in an adjacent the return of Bois-Guilbert.
"Thou hast tarried long," he said; "I have been as if ched on red-hot iron with very impatience. What if Grand Master, or his spy Conrade, had come hither?
paid dear for my complaisance. But what ails thee, er? Thy step totters, thy brow is as black as night.
thou well, Bois-Guilbert?"
"Ay," answered the Templar, "as well as the wretch who omed to die within an hour. Nay, by the rood, not so well; for there be those in such state who can lay life like a cast-off garment. By Heaven, Malvoisin, er girl hath wellnigh unmanned me. I am half reed to go to the Grand Master, abjure the order to his tooth, and refuse to act the brutality which his tyranny posed on me."
"Thou art mad," answered Malvoisin; "thou mayst thus ed utterly ruin thyself, but canst not even find a ce thereby to save the life of this Jewess, which seems ocious in thine eyes. Beaumanoir will name another of the order to defend his judgment in thy place, and the accused will as assuredly perish as if thou hadst taken the duty imposed on thee."

"'Tis false; I will myself take arms in her behalf," answered the Templar, haughtily; "and should I do so, I think, Malvoisin, that thou knowest not one of the order who will keep his saddle before the point of my lance."

"Ay, but thou forgettest," said the wily adviser, "thou wilt have neither leisure nor opportunity to execute this mad project. Go to Lucas Beaumanoir, and say thou hast renounced thy vow of obedience, and see how long the despotic old man will leave thee in personal freedom. The words shall scarce have left thy lips, ere thou wilt either be an hundred feet under ground, in the dungeon of the preceptory, to abide trial as a recreant knight; or, if his opinion holds concerning thy possession, thou wilt be enjoying straw, darkness, and change in some distant convent cell, stunned with exorcisms, and drenched with holy water, to expel the foul fiend which hath obtained dominion over thee. Thou must to the lists, Brian, or thou art a lost and dishonoured man."

"I will break forth and fly," said Bois-Guilbert—"fly to some distant land to which folly and fanaticism have not yet found their way. No drop of the blood of this most excellent creature shall be spilled by my sanction."

"Thou canst not fly," said the preceptor: "thy ravings have excited suspicion, and thou wilt not be permitted to leave the preceptory. Go and make the essay; present thyself before the gate, and command the bridge to be lowered and mark what answer thou shalt receive. Thou art surprised and offended; but is it not better for thee? Wilt thou to fly, what would ensue but the reversal of thy arms, the dishonour of thine ancestry, the degradation of thy rank? Think on it. Where shall thine old companions in arms hide their heads when Brian de Bois-Guilbert, the best lance of the Templars, is proclaimed recreant, hisses of the assembled people? What grief will be at Court of France! With what joy will the haughty hard hear the news, that the knight that set him hard in estine, and wellnigh darkened his renown, has lost fame honour for a Jewish girl, whom he could not even save so costly a sacrifice!"

"Malvoisin," said the Knight, "I thank thee—thou hast tched the strings at which my heart most readily thrills! me of it what may, recreant shall never be added to the me of Bois-Guilbert. Would to God, Richard, or any of avanting minions of England, would appear in these ts! But they will be empty—no one will risk to break ance for the innocent, the forlorn."

"The better for thee, if it prove so," said the preceptor;
o champion appears, it is not by thy means that this lucky damsel shall die, but by the doom of the Grand ster, with whom rests all the blame, and who will count blame for praise and commendation."

"True," said Bois-Guilbert; "if no champion appears, but a part of the pageant, sitting indeed on horseback he lists, but having no part in what is to follow."

"None whatever," said Malvoisin—"no more than the ed image of St. George when it makes part of a proces-

"Well, I will resume my resolution," replied the ghty Templar. "She has despised me—repulsed me—ed me; and wherefore should I offer up for her what- of estimation I have in the opinion of others? Malvoisin, I will appear in the lists."

He left the apartment hastily as he uttered these words, the preceptor followed, to watch and confirm him in his lution; for in Bois-Guilbert's fame he had himself a ng interest, expecting much advantage from his being day at the head of the order, not to mention the prefer- of which Mont-Fitchet had given him hopes, on condit he would forward the condemnation of the unfortunat
Rebecca. Yet although, in combating his friend’s better feelings, he possessed all the advantage which a wily, composed, selfish disposition has over a man agitated by strong and contending passions, it required all Malvoisin’s art to keep Bois-Guilbert steady to the purpose he had prevailed on him to adopt. He was obliged to watch him closely to prevent his resuming his purpose of flight, to intercept his communication with the Grand Master, lest he should come to an open rupture with his superior, and to renew, from time to time, the various arguments by which he endeavoured to show that, in appearing as champion on this occasion, Bois-Guilbert, without either accelerating or ensuring the fate of Rebecca, would follow the only course by which he could save himself from degradation and disgrace.
CHAPTER XL

Shadows avaunt!—Richard's himself again.

When the Black Knight—for it becomes necessary to me the train of his adventures—left the trysting-tree, the generous outlaw, he held his way straight to a neighbouring religious house, of small extent and revenue, called priory of St. Botolph, to which the wounded Ivanhoe was removed when the castle was taken, under the auspices of the faithful Gurth and the magnanimous Iba. It is unnecessary at present to mention what took place in the interim betwixt Wilfred and his deliverer; suffice it to say that, after long and grave communication, messengers were despatched by the prior in several directions, that on the succeeding morning the Black Knight was set to set forth on his journey, accompanied by the jester Iba, who attended as his guide.

'We will meet,' he said to Ivanhoe, 'at Coningsburgh, castle of the deceased Athelstane, since there thy father holds the funeral feast for his noble relation. I could see your Saxon kindred together, Sir Wilfred, and me better acquainted with them than heretofore. Thou also wilt meet me; and it shall be my task to reconcile to thy father.'

So saying, he took an affectionate farewell of Ivanhoe, and expressed an anxious desire to attend upon his deliverer. But the Black Knight would not listen to the pro-
"Rest this day; thou wilt have scarce strength enough to travel on the next. I will have no guide with me but honest Wamba, who can play priest or fool as I shall be most in the humour."

"And I," said Wamba, "will attend you with all my heart. I would fain see the feasting at the funeral of Athelstane; for, if it be not full and frequent, he will rise from the dead to rebuke cook, sewer, and cupbearer; and that were a sight worth seeing. Always, Sir Knight, I will trust your valour with making my excuse to my master Cedric, in case mine own wit should fail."

"And how should my poor valour succeed, Sir Jester, when thy light wit halts? resolve me that."

"Wit, Sir Knight," replied the Jester, "may do much. He is a quick, apprehensive knave, who sees his neighbour's blind side, and knows how to keep the lee-gage when his passions are blowing high. But valour is a sturdy fellow, that makes all split. He rows against both wind and tide, and makes way notwithstanding; and, therefore, good Sir Knight, while I take advantage of the fair weather in my noble master's temper, I will expect you to bestir yourself when it grows rough."

"Sir Knight of the Fetterlock, since it is your pleasure so to be distinguished," said Ivanhoe, "I fear me you have chosen a talkative and a troublesome fool to be your guide. But he knows every path and alley in the woods as well as e'er a hunter who frequents them; and the poor knave, as thou hast partly seen, is as faithful as steel."

"Nay," said the Knight, "an he have the gift of showing my road, I shall not grumble with him that he desires to make it pleasant. Fare thee well, kind Wilfred; I charge thee not to attempt to travel till to-morrow at earliest."

So saying, he extended his hand to Ivanhoe, who pressed it to his lips, took leave of the prior, mounted his horse, and departed, with Wamba for his companion. Ivanhoe fal-

\textit{Lee-gage.} The unexposed side, the safe side.
them with his eyes until they were lost in the shades surrounding forest, and then returned into the con-shortly after matin-song he requested to see the The old man came in haste, and inquired anxiously the state of his health.
was better,” he said, “than my fondest hope could have ted; either my wound has been lighter than the of blood led me to suppose, or this balsam hath a wonderful cure upon it. I feel already as if I wear my corslet; and so much the better, for thoughts my mind which render me unwilling to remain here in inactivity.”
now, the saints forbid,” said the prior, “that the son Saxon Cedric should leave our convent ere his were healed! It were shame to our profession were offer it.”
I would I desire to leave your hospitable roof, venerher,” said Ivanhoe, “did I not feel myself able to the journey, and compelled to undertake it.”
d what can have urged you to so sudden a depa-aid the prior.
ve you never, holy father,” answered the knight, apprehension of approaching evil, for which you in tempted to assign a cause? Have you never found and darkened, like the sunny landscape, by the sudld, which augurs a coming tempest? And thinkest that such impulses are deserving of attention, as the hints of our guardian spirits that danger is ng?”
may not deny,” said the prior, crossing himself, such things have been, and have been of Heaven; such communications have had a visibly useful and tendency. But thou, wounded as thou art, what thou shouldst follow the steps of him whom thou not aid, were he to be assaulted?”
"Prior," said Ivanhoe, "thou dost mistake—I am stole enough to exchange buffets with any who will challenge me to such a traffic. But were it otherwise, may I not say were he in danger, by other means than by force of arm.
It is but too well known that the Saxons love not the Norman race, and who knows what may be the issue if he break in upon them when their hearts are irritated by the death of Athelstane, and their heads heated by the carousel in which they will indulge themselves? I hold his entrance among them at such a moment most perilous, and I am resolved to share or avert the danger; which, that I may the better do, I would crave of thee the use of some palfrey whose pace may be softer than that of my destrier."

"Surely," said the worthy churchman; "you shall have mine own ambling jennet, and I would it ambled as easy for your sake as that of the abbot of St. Alban’s. Yet this will I say for Malkin, for so I call her, that unless you were to borrow a ride on the juggler’s steed that paces a hoop-pipe amongst the eggs, you could not go a journey on a creature so gentle and smooth-paced. I have composed many a homily on her back, to the edification of my brethren of the convent and many poor Christian souls."

"I pray you, reverend father," said Ivanhoe, "let Malkin be got ready instantly, and bid Gurth attend me with mine
arms."

"Nay, but, fair sir," said the prior, "I pray you to remember that Malkin hath as little skill in arms as her matter, and that I warrant not her enduring the sight or weight of your full panoply. Oh, Malkin, I promise you, is a beast of judgment, and will contend against any undue weight
I did but borrow the Fructus Temporum* from the priest of St. Bee’s, and I promise you she would not stir from the gate until I had exchanged the huge volume for my little breviary."

*Destrier. War-horse. {Scott.}
*Fructus Temporum. "Fruit of the Times"; the title of the 5th chronicle.
“Trust me, holy father,” said Ivanhoe, “I will not distress her with too much weight; and if she calls a combat with me, it is odds but she has the worst.”

This reply was made while Gurth was buckling on the knight’s heels a pair of large gilded spurs, capable of convincing any restive horse that best safety lay in being conformable to the will of his rider.

The deep and sharp rowels with which Ivanhoe’s heels were now armed began to make the worthy prior repent of his courtesy and ejaculate: “Nay but, fair sir, now I beg you to think me, my Malkin abideth not the spur. Better it were that you tarry for the mare of our manciple1 down at the stable, which may be had in little more than an hour, and cannot but be tractable, in respect that she draweth much of our winter firewood, and eateth no corn.”

“I thank you, reverend father, but will abide by your first offer, as I see Malkin is already led forth to the gate. Gurth shall carry mine armour; and for the rest, rely on it that, as I will not overload Malkin’s back, she shall not overcome my patience. And now, farewell!”

Ivanhoe now descended the stairs more hastily and quickly than his wound promised, and threw himself upon the ground, eager to escape the importunity of the prior, who stuck as closely to his side as his age and fatness would permit, now singing the praises of Malkin, now recommending attention to the knight in managing her.

“She is at the most dangerous period for maidens as well as mares,” said the old man, laughing at his own jest, being barely in her fifteenth year.”

Ivanhoe, who had other web to weave than to stand canvassing a palfrey’s paces with its owner, lent but a deaf ear to the prior’s grave advices and facetious jests, and having on his mare, and commanded his squire (for such a now called himself) to keep close by his side, he followed the track of the Black Knight into the forest, while

1. Manciple: Steward; from Latin mancipes, a contractor.
the prior stood at the gate of the convent looking after him, and ejaculating: "St. Mary! how prompt and fiery be these men of war! I would I had not trusted Malkin to his keeping, for, crippled as I am with the cold rheum, I am undone if aught but good befalls her. And yet," said he, recollecting himself, "as I would not spare my own old and disabled limbs in the good cause of Old England, so Malkin must e'en run her hazard on the same venture; and it may be they will think our poor house worthy of some munificent guerdon; or, it may be, they will send the old prior a pacing nag. And if they do none of these, as great men will forget little men's service, truly I shall hold me well repaid in having done that which is right. And it is now wellnigh the fitting time to summon the brethren to breakfast in the refectory. Ah! I doubt they obey that call more cheerily than the bells for primes and matins."

So the prior of St. Botolph's hobbled back again into the refectory, to preside over the stock-fish and ale which were just serving out for the friars' breakfast. Purdy and important, he sat him down at the table, and many a dark word he threw out of benefits to be expected to the convent, and high deeds of service done by himself, which at another season would have attracted observation. But as the stock-fish was highly salted, and the ale reasonably powerful, the jaws of the brethren were too anxiously employed to admit of their making much use of their ears; nor do we read of any of the fraternity who was tempted to speculate upon the mysterious hints of their superior, except Father Diggory, who was severely afflicted by the toothache, so that he could only eat on one side of his jaws.

In the mean time, the Black Champion and his guests were pacing at their leisure through the recesses of the forest; the good Knight whiles humming to himself the lay of some enamoured troubadour, sometimes encouraging questions the prating disposition of his attendant.
their dialogue formed a whimsical mixture of song and jest, of which we would fain give our readers some idea. You are then to imagine this Knight, such as we have already described him, strong of person, tall, broad-shouldered, and large of bone, mounted on his mighty black charger, which seemed made on purpose to bear his weight, so easily he paced forward under it, having the visor of his helmet raised, in order to admit freedom of breath, yet keeping the beaver, or under part, closed, so that his features could be but imperfectly distinguished. But his ruddy embrowned cheek-bones could be plainly seen, and the large and bright blue eyes, that flashed from under the dark shade of the raised visor; and the whole gesture and look of the champion expressed careless gaiety and fearless confidence—a mind which was unapt to apprehend danger, and prompt to defy it when most imminent, yet with whom danger was a familiar thought, as with one whose trade was war and adventure.

The Jester wore his usual fantastic habit, but late accidents had led him to adopt a good cutting falchion, instead of his wooden sword, with a targe to match it; of both which weapons he had, notwithstanding his profession, shown himself a skilful master during the storming of Torquillstone. Indeed, the infirmity of Wamba’s brain consisted chiefly in a kind of impatient irritability, which suffered him not long to remain quiet in any posture, or adhere to any certain train of ideas, although he was for a few minutes alert enough in performing any immediate task, or in apprehending any immediate topic. On horseback therefore, he was perpetually swinging himself backwards and forwards, now on the horse’s ears, then anon on the very rump of the animal; now hanging both his legs on one side, and now sitting with his face to the tail, moping, mowing; and making a thousand apish gestures, until his palfrey took his treks so much to heart as fairly to lay him at his length on the green grass—an incident which greatly amused
Knight, but compelled his companion to ride more steadily thereafter.

At the point of their journey at which we take them up, this joyous pair were engaged in singing a virelai, as it was called, in which the clown bore a mellow burden to the better-instructed Knight of the Fetterlock. And thus run the ditty:

Anna Marie, love, up is the sun,
Anna Marie, love, morn is begun,
Mists are dispersing, love, birds singing free,
Up in the morning, love, Anna Marie.
Anna Marie, love, up in the morn,
The hunter is winding blithe sounds on his horn,
The echo rings merry from rock and from tree,
'Tis time to arouse thee, love, Anna Marie.

Wamba.

O Tybalt, love, Tybalt, awake me not yet,
Around my soft pillow while softer dreams flit,
For what are the joys that in waking we prove,
Compared with these visions, O Tybalt, my love?
Let the birds to the rise of the mist carol shrill,
Let the hunter blow out his loud horn on the hill, Softer sounds, softer pleasures, in slumber I prove,—
But think not I dreamt of thee, Tybalt, my love.

"A dainty song," said Wamba, when they had finished their carol, "and I swear by my bauble, a pretty moral! I used to sing it with Gurth, once my playfellow, and now, by the grace of God and his master, no less than a freeman; and we once came by the cudgel for being so entranced by the melody that we lay in bed two hours after sunrise, singing the ditty betwixt sleeping and waking: my bones ache at thinking of the tune ever since. Nevertheless, I have played the part of Anna Marie to please you, fair sir."

The Jester next struck into another carol, a sort of comic ditty, to which the Knight, catching up the tune, replied in the like manner.

1 Virelai. A peculiarly constructed song of the troubadours, which however, in the ditty.
KNIGHT AND WAMBA.

There came three merry men from south, west, and north,
    Ever more sing the roundelay;
To win the Widow of Wycombe forth,
    And where was the widow might say them nay?

The first was a knight, and from Tynedale he came,
    Ever more sing the roundelay;
And his fathers, God save us, were men of great fame,
    And where was the widow might say him nay?

Of his father the laird, of his uncle the squire,
    He boasted in rhyme and in roundelay;
She bade him go bask by his sea-coal fire,
    For she was the widow would say him nay.

WAMBA.

The next that came forth, swore by blood and by nails, Merrily sing the roundelay;
Hur's a gentleman, God wot, and hur's lineage was of Wales,
    And where was the widow might say him nay?

Sir David ap Morgan ap Griffith ap Hugh Ap Tudor ap Rhice, quoth his roundelay;
She said that one widow for so many was too few,
    And she bade the Welshman wend his way.

But then next came a yeoman, a yeoman of Kent,
    Jollily singing his roundelay;
He spoke to the widow of living and rent,
    And where was the widow could say him nay?

BOTH.

So the knight and the squire were both left in the mire
    There for to sing their roundelay;
For a yeoman of Kent, with his yearly rent,
    There never was a widow could say him nay.

"I would, Wamba," said the Knight, "that our host of a trysting-tree, or the jolly Friar, his chaplain, heard this ditty in praise of our bluff yeoman."
"So would not I," said Wamba, "but for the horn that rings at your balfic.

"Ay," said the Knight, "this is a pledge of Locksley's will, though I am not like to need it." Three mots or this bugle will, I am assured, bring round, at our need jolly band of yonder honest yeomen."

"I would say, Heaven forefend," said the Jester, "it not that that fair gift is a pledge they would let us peaceably."

"Why, what meanest thou?" said the Knight; "thou that but for this pledge of fellowship they would sault us?"

"Nay, for me I say nothing," said Wamba; "for g trees have ears as well as stone walls. But canst thou strue me this, Sir Knight? When is thy wine-pitcher thy purse better empty than full?"

"Why, never, I think," replied the Knight.

"Thou never deservest to have a full one in thy hand for so simple an answer! Thou hadst best empty thy pitcher ere thou pass it to a Saxon, and leave thy money home ere thou walk in the greenwood."

"You hold our friends for robbers, then?" said the Knight of the Fetterlock.

"You hear me not say so, fair sir," said Wamba, "may relieve a man’s steed to take off his mail when he has a long journey to make; and, certes, it may do good to rider’s soul to ease him of that which is the root of all evil. Therefore will I give no hard names to those who do such services. Only I would wish my mail at home, and my purse in my chamber, when I meet with these good fellows because it might save them some trouble."

"We are bound to pray for them, my friend, notwithstanding the fair character thou dost afford them."

"Pray for them with all my heart," said Wamba; "but the town, not in the greenwood, like the abbot of St. Be nou who they caused to say mass with an old hollow oak for his stall."

"Say as thou list, Wamba," replied the Knight, "thou yeomen did thy master Cedric yeomanly service at Rose stone."
"Ay, truly," answered Wamba; "but that was in the honour of their trade with Heaven."
"Their trade, Wamba! how mean you by that?" replied companion.
"Marry, thus," said the Jester. "They make up a bal-ced account with Heaven, as our old cellarer used to call ciphering, as fair as Isaac the Jew keeps with his debtors,
I, like him, give out a very little, and take large credit for doing so; reckoning, doubtless, on their own behalf the en-fold usury which the blessed text hath promised to meritorious loans."
"Give me an example of your meaning, Wamba; I know nothing of ciphers or rates of usage," answered the Knight.
"Why," said Wamba, "an your valour be so dull, you do not please to learn that those honest fellows balance a good deed with one not quite so laudable, as a crown given to a begging friar with a hundred byzants taken from a fat pot, or a wench kissed in the greenwood with the relief of a poor widow."
"Which of these was the good deed, which was the mony?" interrupted the Knight.
"A good gibe! a good gibe!" said Wamba; "keeping witty companions sharpeneth the apprehension. You said nothing well, Sir Knight, I will be sworn, when you held drunken peers with the bluff hermit. But to go on.—The merrily of the forest set off the building of a cottage with the orning of a castle, the thatching of a choir against the ing of a church, the setting afree a poor prisoner against murder of a proud sheriff, or, to come nearer to our ment, the deliverance of a Saxon franklin against the burn-alive of a Norman baron. Gentle thieves they are, in art, and courteous robbers; but it is ever the luckiest to et with them when they are at the worst."
"How so, Wamba?" said the Knight.
"Why, then they have some compunction, and are for ing up matters with Heaven. But when they hav struck an even balance, Heaven help them with whom I next open the account! The travellers who first met after their good service at Torquilstone would have a wound flaying. And yet,” said Wamba, coming close up to Knight’s side, “there be companions who are far more dangerous for travellers to meet than yonder outlaws.

“And who may they be, for you have neither bears nor wolves, I trow?” said the Knight.

“Marry sir, but we have Malvoisin’s men-at-arms,” Wamba; “and let me tell you that, in time of civil war, half-score of these is worth a band of wolves at any rate. They are now expecting their harvest, and are reinforced with the soldiers that escaped from Torquilstone; so that if we should meet with a band of them, we are like to pay for our feats of arms. Now, I pray you, Sir Knight, what would you do if we met two of them?”

“Pin the villains to the earth with my lance, Wamba; they offered us any impediment.”

“But what if there were four of them?”

“They should drink of the same cup,” answered the Knight.

“What if six,” continued Wamba, “and we as we are, barely two; would you not remember Locksley’s horn?”

“What! sound for aid,” exclaimed the Knight, “again a score of such rascaille as these, whom one good knight could drive before him, as the wind drives the withered leaves?”

“Nay, then,” said Wamba, “I will pray you for a sight of that same horn that hath so powerful a breath.”

The Knight undid the clasp of the baldric, and indulging his fellow-traveller, who immediately hung the bugle round his own neck.

“Tra-lira-la,” said he, whistling the notes; “nay, I know my gamut as well as another.”

“How mean you, knave?” said the Knight; “repeat the bugle.” Content you, Sir Knight, it is in safe keeping. When and folly travel, folly should bear the horn, because I blow the best."

"Nay, but, rogue," said the Black Knight, "this ex-th thy license. Beware ye tamper not with my

"Urge me not with violence, Sir Knight," said the
"and keeping at a distance from the impatient champion, roll will show a clean pair of heels, and leave valour to ut his way through the wood as best he may."

"Nay, thou hast hit me there," said the Knight; "and say, I have little time to jangle with thee. Keep the an thou wilt, but let us proceed on our journey."

"You will not harm me, then?" said Wamba.
"Tell thee no, thou knave!"

"Ay, but pledge me your knightly word for it," cond Wamba, as he approached with great caution.
"My knightly word I pledge; only come on with thy self."

"Nay, then, valour and folly are once more boon coms," said the Jester, coming up frankly to the Knight’s
"but, in truth, I love not such buffets as that you bed on the burly Friar, when his holiness rolled on the like a king of the nine-pins. And now that folly
the horn, let valour rouse himself and shake his mane;
I mistake not, there are company in yonder brake that in the lookout for us."

"What makes thee judge so?" said the Knight.

Because I have twice or thrice noticed the glance of a on from amongst the green leaves. Had they been men, they had kept the path. But yonder thicket is ice chapel for the clerks of St. Nicholas."

"By my faith," said the Knight, closing his visor, "I thou be'st in the right on’t."

*In good time did he close it, for three arrows flew at.

shion. A helmet, round in shape and visorless.
the same instant from the suspected spot against his hand and breast, one of which would have penetrated to the heart had it not been turned aside by the steel visor. The two were averted by the gorget, and by the shield which hung around his neck.

"Thanks, trusty armourer," said the Knight. "We will let us close with them," and he rode straight to the left. He was met by six or seven men-at-arms, who ran at him with their lances at full career. Three of them struck against him, and splintered with as little effect as they had been driven against a tower of steel. The Knight's eyes seemed to flash fire even through the steel of his visor. He raised himself in his stirrups with an inexpressible dignity, and exclaimed, "What mean my masters!" The men made no other reply than by raising their swords and attacking him on every side, "Die, tyrant!"

"Ha! St. Edward! Ha! St. George!" said the Knight, striking down a man at every invocation; "Are traitors here?"

His opponents, desperate as they were, bore back an arm which carried death in every blow, and it seemed as if the terror of his single strength was about to gain him the battle against such odds, when a knight, in blue armor, had hitherto kept himself behind the other assiduously spurred forward with his lance, and taking aim, not at the rider but at the steed, wounded the noble animal mortally.

"That was a felon stroke!" exclaimed the Black Knight as the steed fell to the earth, bearing his rider along with him.

And at this moment Wamba wended the bugle, which had passed so speedily that he had not time to rise. The sudden sound made the murderers bend once more, and Wamba, though so imperfectly was he did not hesitate to rush in and assist the Black Knight.
Shame on ye, false cowards!” exclaimed he in the blue ness, who seemed to lead the assailants, “do ye fly from empty blast of a horn blown by a jester?”

Animated by his words, they attacked the Black Knight ish, whose best refuge was now to place his back against the oak, and defend himself with his sword. The felon right, who had taken another spear, watching the moment when his formidable antagonist was most closely sed, galloped against him in hopes to nail him with his against the tree, when his purpose was again inter-ped by Wamba. The Jester, making up by agility the lack of strength, and little noticed by the men-at-arms, who busied in their more important object, hovered on skirts of the fight, and effectually checked the fatal ner of the Blue Knight, by hamstringing his horse with oke of his sword. Horse and man went to the ground;
he situation of the Knight of the Fetterlock continued precarious, as he was pressed close by several men comdly armed, and began to be fatigued by the violent exerecessary to defend himself on so many points at ly the same moment, when a grey-goose shaft suddenly ched on the earth one of the most formidable of his ants, and a band of yeomen broke forth from the glade, ed by Locksley and the jovial Friar, who, taking ready effectual part in the fray, soon disposed of the ruffians, of whom lay on the spot dead or mortally wounded. The ight thanked his deliverers with a dignity they ot observed in his former bearing, which hitherto had red rather that of a blunt, bold soldier than of a person alted rank.

It concerns me much,” he said, “even before I express ull gratitude to my ready friends, to discover, if I may, ave been my unprovoked enemies. Open the visor of Blue Knight, Wamba, who seems the chief of these ns.”

The Jester instantly made up to the leader of the assassins, who, bruised by his fall, and entangled under the wounded steed, lay incapable either of flight or resistance.

"Come, valiant sir," said Wamba, "I must be your armourer as well as your equerry.¹ I have dismounted you, and now I will unhelm you."

So saying, with no very gentle hand he undid the helmet of the Blue Knight, which, rolling to a distance on the grass, displayed to the Knight of the Fetterlock grizzled locks, and a countenance he did not expect to have seen under such circumstances.

"Waldemar Fitzurse!" he said in astonishment; "what could urge one of thy rank and seeming worth to so foul an undertaking?"

"Richard," said the captive knight, looking up to him, "thou knowest little of mankind, if thou knowest not to what ambition and revenge can lead every child of Adam."

"Revenge!" answered the Black Knight; "I never wronged thee. On me thou hast nought to revenge."

"My daughter, Richard, whose alliance thou didst seek—was that no injury to a Norman, whose blood is noble as thine own?"

"Thy daughter!" replied the Black Knight. "A proper cause of enmity, and followed up to a bloody issue! Stand back, my masters, I would speak to him alone. And now, Waldemar Fitzurse, say me the truth: confess who set thee on this traitorous deed."

"Thy father's son," answered Waldemar, "who, in doing, did but avenge on thee thy disobedience to thy father."

Richard's eyes sparkled with indignation, but his better nature overcame it. He pressed his hand against his brow, and remained an instant gazing on the face of the humbled baron, in whose features pride was contending with shame.

"Thou dost not ask thy life, Waldemar?" said the King.

¹ Equerry. The attendant who had particular charge of the king's horses, and who attended with the squires.
"He that is in the lion’s clutch," answered Fitzurse, knows it were needless."

"Take it, then, unasked," said Richard; "the lion preys not on prostrate carcasses. Take thy life, but with this condition, that in three days thou shalt leave England, and go to hide thine infamy in thy Norman castle, and that thou wilt never mention the name of John of Anjou as connected with thy felony. If thou art found on English ground after the space I have allotted thee, thou diest; or if thou breathest aught that can attain the honour of my house, by St. George! not the altar itself shall be a sanctuary. I will hang thee out to feed the ravens from the very pinnacle of thine own castle. Let this knight have a steed, Locksley, for I see your yeomen have caught those which were running loose, and let him depart unharmed."

"But that I judge I listen to a voice whose behests must not be disputed," answered the yeoman, "I would send a shaft after the skulking villain that should spare him the hour of a long journey."

"Thou bearest an English heart, Locksley," said the Sack Knight, "and well dost judge thou art the more bound to obey my behest: I am Richard of England!"

At these words, pronounced in a tone of majesty suited the high rank, and no less distinguished character, of leur-de-Lion, the yeomen at once kneeled down before him, and at the same time tendered their allegiance, and implored pardon for their offences.

"Rise, my friends," said Richard, in a gracious tone, looking on them with a countenance in which his habitual good-humour had already conquered the blaze of hasty resentment, and whose features retained no mark of the late desperate conflict, excepting the flush arising from exertion—"arise," he said, "my friends! Your misdemeanours, whether in forest or field, have been atoned by the loyal services you rendered my distressed subjects before the walls of Torquilstone, and the rescue you have this day afforded..." to your sovereign. Arise, my liegemen, and be good subjects in future. And thou, brave Locksley—"

"Call me no longer Locksley, my Liege, but know me under the name which, I fear, fame hath blown too widely not to have reached even your royal ears: I am Robin Hood of Sherwood Forest."

"King of outlaws, and Prince of good fellows!" said the King, "who hath not heard a name that has been borne as far as Palestine? But be assured, brave outlaw, that no deed done in our absence, and in the turbulent times to which it hath given rise, shall be remembered to thy disadvantage."

"True says the proverb," said Wamba, interposing his word, but with some abatement of his usual petulance—

'When the cat is away,
The mice will play.'

"What, Wamba, art thou there?" said Richard; "I have been so long of hearing thy voice, I thought thou hadst taken flight."

"I take flight!" said Wamba; "when do you ever find folly separated from valour? There lies the trophy of my sword, that good grey gelding, whom I heartily wish upon his legs again, conditioning his master lay there houghed in his place. It is true, I gave a little ground at first, for a motley jacket does not brook lance-heads as a steel doublet will. But if I fought not at sword's point, you will grant me that I sounded the onset."

"And to good purpose, honest Wamba," replied the King. "Thy good service shall not be forgotten."

"Confiteor! confiteor!" exclaimed, in a submissive tone, a voice near the King's side; "my Latin will carry me no farther, but I confess my deadly treason, and pray leave to have absolution before I am led to execution!"

Richard looked around, and beheld the jovial Friar on his knees, telling his rosary, while his quarter-staff, which had not been idle during the skirmish, lay on the grass beside him. His countenance was gathered so as he thought might best express the most profound contrition, his eyes being turned up, and the corners of his mouth drawn down, as Wamba expressed it, like the tassels at the mouth of a purse. Yet this demure affectation of extreme penitence was whimsically belied by a ludicrous meaning which lurked in his huge features, and seemed to pronounce his fear and repentance alike hypocritical.

"For what art thou cast down, mad priest?" said Richard; "art thou afraid thy diocesan should learn how truly thou dost serve Our Lady and St. Dunstan? Tush man! fear it not; Richard of England betrays no secrets that pass over the flagon."

"Nay, most gracious sovereign," answered the hermit, well known to the curious in penny histories of Robin Hood by the name of Friar Tuck, "it is not the crosier I fear, but the sceptre. Alas! that my sacrilegious fist should ever have been applied to the ear of the Lord’s anointed!"

"Ha! ha!" said Richard, "sits the wind there? In truth, had forgotten the buffet, though mine ear sung after it a whole day. But if the cuff was fairly given, I will be judged by the good men around, if it was not as well repaid; or, if thou thinkest I still owe thee aught, and will stand forth for another counterbuff—"

"By no means," replied Friar Tuck, "I had mine own returned, and with usury: may your Majesty ever pay your debts as fully!"

"If I could do so with cuffs," said the King, "my creditors should have little reason to complain of an empty exchequer."

* CROSIER ... SCEPTRE. Not the bishop, but the king.
“And yet,” said the Friar, resuming his demure, hypocritical countenance, “I know not what penance I ought to perform for that most sacrilegious blow!"

“Speak no more of it, brother,” said the King; “after having stood so many cuffs from Paynims and unbelievers, I were void of reason to quarrel with the buffet of a clerk so holy as he of Copmanhurst. Yet, mine honest Friar, I think it would be best both for the church and thyself that I should procure a license to unfrock thee, and retain thee, as a yeoman of our guard, serving in care of our person, as formerly in attendance upon the altar of St. Dunstan.”

“My Liege,” said the Friar, “I humbly crave your pardon; and you would readily grant my excuse, did you but know how the sin of laziness has beset me. St. Dunstan—may he be gracious to us!—stands quiet in his niche, though I should forget my orisons in killing a fat buck; I stay out of my cell sometimes a night, doing I wot not what—St. Dunstan never complains—a quiet master he is, and a peaceful, as ever was made of wood. But to be a yeoman in attendance on my sovereign the King—the honour is great, doubtless—yet, if I were but to step aside to comfort a widow in one corner, or to kill a deer in another, it would be, ‘Where is the dog priest?’ says one. ‘Who has seen the accursed Tuck?’ says another. ‘The unfrocked villain destroys more venison than half the country besides,’ says one keeper; ‘And is hunting after every shy doe in the country!’ quoth a second. In fine, good my Liege, I pray you to leave me as you found me; or, if in aught you desire to extend your benevolence to me, that I may be considered as the poor clerk of St. Dunstan’s cell in Copmanhurst, to whom any small donation will be most thankfully acceptable.”

“I understand thee,” said the King, “and the holy clerk shall have a grant of vert and venison in my woods; of

1 A NIGHT. A usage almost obsolete: in Anglo-Saxon was the same in, on. Compare nowadays.
2 VERD AND VENISON. “Greenwood and game”; freedom of the woods.
Wharncliffe. Mark, however, I will but assign thee three bucks every season; but if that do not prove an apology for thy slaying thirty, I am no Christian knight nor true king."

"Your Grace may be well assured," said the Friar, "that, with the grace of St. Dunstan, I shall find the way of multiplying your most bounteous gift."

"I nothing doubt it, good brother," said the King; "and as venison is but dry food, our cellarer shall have orders to deliver to thee a butt of sack, a runlet of Malvoisie, and three hogsheads of ale of the first strike, yearly. If that will not quench thy thirst, thou must come to court, and become acquainted with my butler."

"But for St. Dunstan?" said the Friar——

"A cope, a stole, and an altar-cloth shalt thou also have," continued the King, crossing himself. "But we may not turn our game into earnest, lest God punish us for hinking more on our follies than on His honour and worship."

"I will answer for my patron," said the priest, joyously.

"Answer for thyself, Friar," said King Richard, some-ing sternly; but immediately stretching out his hand to he hermit, the latter, somewhat abashed, bent his knee, nd saluted it. "Thou dost less honour to my extended alm than to my clenched fist," said the monarch; "thou idst only kneel to the one, and to the other didst pros-rate thyself."

But the Friar, afraid perhaps of again giving offence by continuing the conversation in too jocose a style—a false	ep to be particularly guarded against by those who converse with monarchs—bowed profoundly, and fell into the ear.

At the same time, two additional personages appeared on the scene.

* Strike. Strength or quality.
CHAPTER XLI

All hail to the lordlings of high degree,
Who live not more happy, though greater than we
Our pastimes to see,
Under every green tree,
In all the gay woodland, right welcome ye be.

MACDONALD.

The new-comers were Wilfred of Ivanhoe, on the prior of Botolph’s palfrey, and Gurth, who attended him, on the knight’s own war-horse. The astonishment of Ivahnhe was beyond bounds when he saw his master besprinkled with blood, and six or seven dead bodies lying around in the little glade in which the battle had taken place. Nor was he less surprised to see Richard surrounded by so many silvan attendants, the outlaws, as they seemed to be, of the forest, and a perilous retinue therefore for a prince. He hesitated whether to address the King as the Black Knight-errant, or in what other manner to demean himself towards him.
Richard saw his embarrassment.

“Fear not, Wilfred,” he said, “to address Richard Plantagenet as himself, since thou seest him in the company of ture English hearts, although it may be they have been urged a few steps aside by warm English blood.”

“Sir Wilfred of Ivanhoe,” said the gallant outlaw, stepping forward, “my assurances can add nothing to those of our sovereign; yet, let me say somewhat proudly, that of men who have suffered much, he hath no truer subjects than those who now stand around him.”

“I cannot doubt it, brave man,” said Wilfred, “since thou art of the number. But what mean these marks of death and danger—these slain men, and the bloody traces of my Prince?”
“Treason hath been with us, Ivanhoe,” said the King; “but, thanks to these brave men, treason hath met its meed. But, now I bethink me, thou too art a traitor,” said Richard, smiling—“a most disobedient traitor; for were not our orders positive that thou shouldst repose thyself at St. Botolph’s until thy wound was healed?”

“It is healed,” said Ivanhoe—“it is not of more consequence than the scratch of a bodkin. But why—oh why, noble Prince, will you thus vex the hearts of your faithful servants, and expose your life by lonely journeys and rash adventures, as if it were of no more value than that of a mere knight-errant, who has no interest but what lance and sword may procure him?”

“And Richard Plantagenet,” said the King, “desires no more fame than his good lance and sword may acquire him; and Richard Plantagenet is prouder of achieving an adventure, with only his good sword and his good arm to speed, than if he led to battle an host of an hundred thousand armed men.”

“But your kingdom, my Liege,” said Ivanhoe—“your kingdom is threatened with dissolution and civil war; your subjects menaced with every species of evil, if deprived of their sovereign in some of those dangers which it is your daily pleasure to incur, and from which you have but this moment narrowly escaped.”

“Ho! ho! my kingdom and my subjects!” answered Richard, impatiently; “I tell thee, Sir Wilfred, the best of them are most willing to repay my follies in kind. For example, my very faithful servant, Wilfred of Ivanhoe, will not obey my positive commands, and yet reads his king a homily, because he does not walk exactly by his advice. Which of us has most reason to upbraid the other? Yet forgive me, my faithful Wilfred. The time I have spent, and am yet to spend, in concealment is, as I explained to thee at St. Botolph’s, necessary to give my friends an faithful nobles time to assemble their forces, that, when Richard's return is announced, he should be at the head of such a force as enemies shall tremble to face, and thus subdue the meditated treason, without even unsheathing a sword. Estoteville and Bohun will not be strong enough to move forward to York for twenty-four hours. I must have news of Salisbury from the south, and of Beauchamp in Warwickshire, and of Multon and Percy in the north. The Chancellor must make sure of London. Too sudden an appearance would subject me to dangers other than my lance and sword, though backed by the bow of bold Robin, or the quarter-staff of Friar Tuck, and the horn of the sage Wamba, may be able to rescue me from."

Wilfred bowed in submission, well knowing how vain it was to contend with the wild spirit of chivalry which so often impelled his master upon dangers which he might easily have avoided, or, rather, which it was unpardonable in him to have sought out. The young knight sighed, therefore, and held his peace; while Richard, rejoiced at having silenced his counsellor, though his heart acknowledged the justice of the charge he had brought against him, went on in conversation with Robin Hood. "King of outlaws," he said, "have you no refreshment to offer to your brother sovereign? for these dead knaves have found me both in exercise and appetite."

"In troth," replied the outlaw, "for I scorn to lie to your Grace, our larder is chiefly supplied with—" He stopped, and was somewhat embarrassed.

"With venison, I suppose?" said Richard, gaily; "better food at need there can be none; and truly, if a king will not remain at home and slay his own game, methinks he should not brawl too loud if he finds it killed to his hand."

"If your Grace, then," said Robin, "will again honour with your presence one of Robin Hood's places of we-

* Salisbury. Pronounced Sauls-bury.
* Beauchamp. Pronounced Beecham.
dezuvoz, the venison shall not be lacking; and a stoup of ale, and it may be a cup of reasonably good wine, to relish it withal.”

The outlaw accordingly led the way, followed by the buxom monarch, more happy, probably, in this chance meeting with Robin Hood and his foresters than he would have been in again assuming his royal state, and presiding over a splendid circle of peers and nobles. Novelty in society and adventure were the zest of life to Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and it had its highest relish when enhanced by dangers encountered and surmounted. In the lion-hearted king, the brilliant, but useless, character of a knight of romance was in great measure realised and revived; and the personal glory which he acquired by his own deeds of arms was far more dear to his excited imagination than that which a course of policy and wisdom would have spread around his government. Accordingly, his reign was like the course of a brilliant and rapid meteor, which shoots along the face of heaven, shedding around an unnecessary and portentous light, which is instantly swallowed up by universal darkness; his feats of chivalry furnishing themes for bards and minstrels, but affording none of those solid benefits to his country on which history loves to pause, and hold up as an example to posterity. But in his present company Richard showed to the greatest imaginable advantage. He was gay, good-humoured, and fond of manhood in every rank of life.

Beneath a huge oak-tree the silvan repast was hastily prepared for the King of England, surrounded by men outlaws to his government, but who now formed his court and his guard. As the flagon went round, the rough foresters soon lost their awe for the presence of Majesty. The song and the jest were exchanged, the stories of former deeds were told with advantage; and at length, and while boasting of their successful infraction of the laws, no one reflected they were speaking in presence of their nat guardian. The merry King, nothing heeding his dignity any more than his company, laughed, quaffed, and jested among the jolly band. The natural and rough sense of Robin Hood led him to be desirous that the scene should be closed ere anything should occur to disturb its harmony, the more especially that he observed Ivanhoe’s brow clouded with anxiety. “We are honoured,” he said to Ivanhoe, apart, “by the presence of our gallant sovereign; yet I would not that he dallied with time which the circumstances of his kingdom may render precious.”

“It is well and wisely spoken, brave Robin Hood,” said Wilfred, apart; “and know, moreover, that they who jest with Majesty, even in its gayest mood, are but toying with the lion’s whelp, which, on slight provocation, uses both fangs and claws.”

“You have touched the very cause of my fear,” said the outlaw. “My men are rough by practice and nature; the King is hasty as well as good-humoured; nor know I how soon cause of offence may arise, or how warmly it may be received; it is time this revel were broken off.”

“It must be by your management, then, gallant yeoman,” said Ivanhoe; “for each hint I have assayed to give him serves only to induce him to prolong it.”

“Must I so soon risk the pardon and favour of my sovereign?” said Robin Hood, pausing for an instant; “but, by St. Christopher, it shall be so. I were undeserving his grace did I not peril it for his good. Here, Scathlock, get thee behind yonder thicket, and wind me a Norman blast on thy bugle, and without an instant’s delay, on peril of your life.”

Scathlock obeyed his captain, and in less than five minutes the revellers were startled by the sound of his horn.

“It is the bugle of Malvoisin,” said the Miller, starting to his feet, and seizing his bow. The Friar dropped the flagon, and grasped his quarter-staff. Wamba stood dumb.
at the midst of a jest, and betook himself to sword and target. All the others stood to their weapons.

Men of their precarious course of life change readily from the banquet to the battle; and to Richard the exchange seemed but a succession of pleasure. He called for his helmet and the most cumbrous parts of his armour, which he had laid aside; and while Gurth was putting them on, he laid his strict injunctions on Wilfred, under pain of highest displeasure, not to engage in the skirmish which supposed was approaching.

"Thou hast fought for me an hundred times, Wilfred, and I have seen it. Thou shalt this day look on, and see how Richard will fight for his friend and liegeman."

In the mean time, Robin Hood had sent off several of his followers in different directions, as if to reconnoitre the enemy; and when he saw the company effectually broken, he approached Richard, who was now completely armed, and kneeling down on one knee, craved pardon of his sovereign.

"For what, good yeoman?" said Richard, somewhat impatiently. "Have we not already granted thee a full pardon for all transgressions? Thinkest thou our word is a feather, to be blown backward and forward between us? Thou hast not have time to commit any new offence since that time?"

"Ay, but I have though," answered the yeoman, "if it were an offence to deceive my prince for his own advantage. The bugle you have heard was none of Malvoisin's, but blown by my direction, to break off the banquet, lest it lasted upon hours of dearer import than to be thus dally with."

He then rose from his knee, folded his arms on his胸, and, in a manner rather respectful than submissive, waited the answer of the King, like one who is conscious may have given offence, yet is confident in the rectitude of
IVANHOE

of his motive. The blood rushed in anger to the countenance of Richard; but it was the first transient emotion and his sense of justice instantly subdued it.

"The King of Sherwood," he said, "grudges his ven and his wine-flask to the King of England! It is well, Robin! but when you come to see me in merry London, trust to be a less niggard host. Thou art right, how good fellow. Let us therefore to horse and away. W has been impatient this hour. Tell me, bold Robin, thou never a friend in thy band, who, not content with vising, will needs direct thy motions and look mis when thou dost presume to act for thyself?"

"Such a one," said Robin, "is my lieutenant. John, who is even now absent on an expedition as far borders of Scotland; and I will own to your Majesty, I am sometimes displeased by the freedom of his coun but, when I think twice, I cannot be long angry who can have no motive for his anxiety save zeal master's service."

"Thou art right, good yeoman," answered I "and if I had Ivanhoe, on the one hand, to give ad vice, and recommend it by the sad gravity of his be thee, on the other, to trick me into what thou thin own good, I should have as little the freedom of will as any king in Christendom or Heathenen come, sirs, let us merrily on to Coningsburgh, and more on't."

Robin Hood assured them that he had detached in the direction of the road they were to pass, not fail to discover and apprise them of any sec cade; and that he had little doubt they would be secure, or, if otherwise, would receive such of the danger as would enable them to fall back a troop of archers, with which he himself gro on the same route.

The wise and attentive precautions touched Richard's feelings, and removed any slight which he might retain on account of the deception by which Has Black Swan captain had practiced upon him. He once more offered his hand to Robin Hood, assured him of his full and future favour, as well as his firm resolution to the tyrannical exercise of the forest rights and pressive laws, by which so many English yeomen were even driven into a state of rebellion. But Richard's good nature towards the bold outlaw were frustrated by the untimely death; and the Charter of the Forest was subtracted from the unwilling hands of King John when he ded to his heroic brother. As for the rest of Robin Hood's career, as well as the tale of his treacherous death, to be found in those black-letter garlands, once
the low and easy rate of one half-penny—

Now cheaply purchased at their weight in gold.

outlaw's opinion proved true; and the King, at least the last day of the year Ivanhoe, Gurth, and Wamba, arrived without any motion within view of the Castle of Coningsburgh, the sun was yet in the horizon.

A few more beautiful or striking scenes in England are presented by the vicinity of this ancient fortress. The soft and gentle river Don sweeps through an amphitheatre, in which cultivation is richly with woodland, and on a mount ascending from the firth defended by walls and ditches, rises this ancient building, which, as its Saxon name implies, was, previous to quest, a royal residence of the kings of England.
There walls have probably been added by the Normans, inner keep bears token of a very great antiquity.
uted on a mount at one angle of the inner court,
as a complete circle of perhaps twenty-five feet in

The wall is of immense thickness, and is propped up by six huge external buttresses, which project

ETER GARLANDS. Collections of ballads in the Old English
IVANHOE

The circle, and rise up against the sides of the tower to strengthen or to support it. These massive bulwarks of the keep itself. The distant appearance of the castle is to the eager antiquary, whose imagination it carries back to the days of the Heptarchy. Now, in the vicinity of the castle is pointed out as the tomb of the memorable Hengist; and various monuments of great antiquity and curiosity, are shown in the neighbouring churchyard.

When Coeur-de-Lion and his retinue approached the building, it was not, as at present, surrounded by external fortifications. The Saxon architec ture had exhausted his art in rendering the main keep defensible, and there was no other circumvallation than a barrier of palisades.

A huge black banner, which floated from the tent on the tower, announced that the obsequies of the late were still in the act of being solemnised. It bore noblem of the deceased's birth or quality, for armoryings were then a novelty among the Norman chivalry; they were totally unknown to the Saxons. But the gate was another banner, on which the figure of a horse, rudely painted, indicated the nation and the deceased by the well-known symbol of his Saxon warriors.

All around the castle was a scene of busy for such funeral banquets were times of general fuse hospitality, which not only every one who One White Horse. This was the emblem of the ancient Saxons in England the turf on the hillside or the growth on a cliff has by to leave the rude figure of a horse upon the white face of singular monuments of the past are perpetuated by every face by the communities that preserve the distant connexion with the deceased, but all pas-whatsoever, were invited to partake. The wealth-sequence of the deceased Athelstane occasioned this be observed in the fullest extent.

Numerous parties, therefore, were seen ascending and ing the hill on which the castle was situated; and King and his attendants entered the open and gates of the external barrier, the space within a scene not easily reconciled with the cause of ablation. In one place cooks were toiling to roast and fat sheep; in another, hogsheads of ale were ch, to be drained at the freedom of all comers.
of every description were to be seen devouring the swallowing the liquor thus abandoned to their

The naked Saxon serf was drowning the sense year’s hunger and thirst in one day of gluttony kness; the more pampered burgess and guild-was eating his morsel with gust, or curiously crit-quantity of the malt and the skill of the brewer.
of the poorer Norman gentry might also be seen ished by their shaven chins and short cloaks, and so by their keeping together, and looking with on the whole solemnity, even while condescend-tail themselves of the good cheer which was so libplied.

licants were, of course, assembled by the score,
with strolling soldiers returned from Palestine
g to their own account at least); pedlars were dis-their wares; travelling mechanics were inquiring ployment; and wandering palmers, hedge-priests, instrels, and Welsh bards were muttering prayers, acted mistuned dirges from their harps, crowds,¹

One sent forth the praises of Athelstane in a aneugry; another, in a Saxon genealogical poem,

¹The crowd, or crowd, was a species of violin. Rote. A sort rather hurdy-gurdy, the strings of which were managed by a which the instrument took its name. [Scott.]
rehearsed the uncouth and harsh names of his noble ancestry. Jesters and jugglers were not wanting, nor was the occasion of the assembly supposed to render the exercise of their profession indecorous or improper. Indeed, the ideas of the Saxons on these occasions were as natural as they were rude. If sorrow was thirsty, there was drink; if hungry, there was food; if it sunk down upon and saddened the heart, here were the means supplied of mirth, or at least of amusement. Nor did the assistants scorn to avail themselves of those means of consolation, although, every now and then, as if suddenly recollecting the cause which had brought them together, the men groaned in unison, while the females, of whom many were present, raised up their voices and shrieked for very woe.

Such was the scene in the castle-yard at Coningsburgh when it was entered by Richard and his followers. The seneschal or steward deigned not to take notice of the groups of inferior guests who were perpetually entering and withdrawing, unless so far as was necessary to preserve order; nevertheless, he was struck by the good mien of the Monarch and Ivanhoe, more especially as he imagined the features of the latter were familiar to him. Besides, the approach of two knights, for such their dress bespoke them, was a rare event at a Saxon solemnity, and could not but be regarded as a sort of honour to the deceased and his family. And in his sable dress, and holding in his hand his white wand of office, this important personage made his way through the miscellaneous assemblage of guests, thus conducting Richard and Ivanhoe to the entrance of the tower. Gurth and Wamba speedily found acquaintances in the courtyard, nor presumed to intrude themselves any further until their presence should be required.
CHAPTER XLII

I found them winding of Marcello's corpse.
And there was such a solemn melody.
'Twixt doleful songs, tears, and sad elegies,—
Such as old grandames, watching by the dead,
Are wont to outwear the night with.

Old Play.

The mode of entering the great tower of Coningsburgh is very peculiar, and partakes of the rude simplicity of early times in which it was erected. A flight of steps, steep and narrow as to be almost precipitous, leads up to an portal in the south side of the tower, by which the arduous antiquary may still, or at least could a few years ago gain access to a small stair within the thickness of the wall of the tower, which leads up to the third story of buildings—the two lower being dungeons or vaults, neither receive air nor light, save by a square hole in third story, with which they seem to have communicated by a ladder. The access to the upper apartments in tower, which consist in all of four stories, is given by which are carried up through the external buttresses.

By this difficult and complicated entrance, the good Richard, followed by his faithful Ivanhoe, was ushered into the round apartment which occupies the whole of third story from the ground. Wilfred, by the difficulties of the ascent, gained time to muffle his face in his ule, as it had been held expedient that he should not unt himself to his father until the King should give him signal.

Here were assembled in this apartment, around a large table, about a dozen of the most distinguished representatives of the Saxon families in the adjacent counties. These were all old, or at least elderly, men; for the younger race, to the great displeasure of the seniors, had, like Ivanhoe, broken down many of the barriers which separated for half a century the Norman victors from the vanquished Saxons. The downcast and sorrowful looks of these venerable men, their silence and their mournful posture, formed a strong contrast to the levity of the revellers on the outside of the castle. Their grey locks and long full beards, together with their antique tunics and loose black mantles, suited well with the singular and rude apartment in which they were seated, and gave the appearance of a band of ancient worshippers of Woden, recalled to life to mourn over the decay of their national glory.

Cedric, seated in equal rank among his countrymen, seemed yet, by common consent, to act as chief of the assembly. Upon the entrance of Richard (only known to him as the valorous Knight of the Fetterlock) he arose gravely, and gave him welcome by the ordinary salutation, Waes hael, raising at the same time a goblet to his head. The King, no stranger to the customs of his English subjects, returned the greeting with the appropriate words, Drinc hael, and partook of a cup which was handed to him by the sewer. The same courtesy was offered to Ivanhoe, who pledged his father in silence, supplying the usual speech by an inclination of his head, lest his voice should have been recognised.

When this introductory ceremony was performed, Cedric arose, and, extending his hand to Richard, conducted him into a small and very rude chapel, which was excavated, as it were, out of one of the external buttresses. As there was no opening, saving a very narrow loophole, the place would have been nearly quite dark but for two flambeaux or torches, which showed, by a red and smoky light, the arched roof and naked walls, the rude altar of stone, and the crucifix of the same material.
Before this altar was placed a bier, and on each side of his bier kneeled three priests, who told their beads, and uttered their prayers, with the greatest signs of external devotion. For this service a splendid "soul-scat" was paid to the convent of St. Edmund's by the mother of the deceased; and, that it might be fully deserved, the whole brethren, saving the lame sacristan, had transferred themselves to Coningsburgh, where, while six of their number were constantly on guard in the performance of divine rites by the bier of Athelstane, the others failed not to take their share of the refreshments and amusements which went on at the castle. In maintaining this pious watch and ward, the good monks were particularly careful not to interrupt their hymns for an instant, lest Zernebock, the ancient Saxon Apollyon, should lay his clutches on the departed Athel-stane. Nor were they less careful to prevent any unhallowed layman from touching the pall, which having been that used at the funeral of St. Edmund, was liable to be esecrated if handled by the profane. If, in truth, these intentions could be of any use to the deceased, he had someught to expect them at the hands of the brethren of St.
edmund's, since, besides a hundred mancuses of gold paid down as the soul-ransom, the mother of Athelstane had anounced her intention of endowing that foundation with the better part of the lands of the deceased, in order to maintain perpetual prayers for his soul and that of her departed husband.

Richard and Wilfred followed the Saxon Cedric into the dpartment of death, where, as their guide pointed with slenm air to the untimely bier of Athelstane, they followed as example in devoutly crossing themselves, and muttering brief prayer for the weal of the departed soul.

This act of pious charity performed, Cedric again mo-ioned them to follow him, gliding over the stone floor with noiseless tread; and, after ascending a few steps, opened ith great caution the door of a small oratory, which ad joined to the chapel. It was about eight feet square, hollowed, like the chapel itself, out of the thickness of the wall; and the loophole which enlightened it being to the west, and widening considerably as it sloped inward, a beam of the setting sun found its way into its dark recess, and showed a female of a dignified mien, and whose countenance retained the marked remains of majestic beauty. Her long mourning robes, and her flowing wimple\(^1\) of black cypress, enhanced the whiteness of her skin, and the beauty of her light-coloured and flowing tresses, which time had neither thinned nor mingled with silver. Her countenance expressed the deepest sorrow that is consistent with resignation. On the stone table before her stood a crucifix of ivory, beside which was laid a missal, having its pages richly illuminated, and its boards adorned with clasps of gold and bosses of the same precious metal.

“Noble Edith,” said Cedric, after having stood a moment silent, as if to give Richard and Wilfred time to look upon the lady of the mansion, “these are worthy strangers come to take a part in thy sorrows. And this, in especial, is the valiant knight who fought so bravely for the deliverance of him for whom we this day mourn.”

“His bravery has my thanks,” returned the lady; “although it be the will of Heaven that it should be displayed in vain. I thank, too, his courtesy, and that of his companion, which hath brought them hither to behold the widow of Adeling, the mother of Athelstane, in her deep hour of sorrow and lamentation. To your care, kind kinman, I entrust them, satisfied that they will want no hospitality which these sad walls can yet afford.”

The guests bowed deeply to the mourning parent, and withdrew with their hospitable guide.

Another winding stair conducted them to an apartment of the same size with that which they had first entered, occupying indeed the story immediately above. From this

\(^1\) Wimple. A kerchief covering not only the neck, but also the cheeks and the sides of the face: usually of linen, but here of crepe.
ere yet the door was opened, proceeded a low and melancholy strain of vocal music. When they entered, found themselves in the presence of about twenty ons and maidens of distinguished Saxon lineage. Four ens, Rowena leading the choir, raised a hymn for the of the deceased, of which we have only been able to her two or three stanzas:

Dust unto dust,
To this all must.
The tenant hath resign’d
The faded form
To waste and worm;
Corruption claims her kind.

Through paths unknown
Thy soul hath flown,
To seek the realms of woe,
Where fiery pain
Shall purge the stain
Of actions done below.

In that sad place,
By Mary’s grace,
Brief may thy dwelling be!
Till prayers and alms,
And holy psalms,
Shall set the captive free!

While this dirge was sung, in a low and melancholy tone, the female choristers, the others were divided into two s, of which one was engaged in bedecking, with such oидery as their skill and taste could compass, a large a pall, destined to cover the bier of Athelstane, while others busied themselves in selecting, from baskets of rs placed before them, garlands, which they intended he same mournful purpose. The behaviour of the ens was decorous, if not marked with deep affliction; now and then a whisper or a smile called forth the re of the severer matrons, and here and there might be a damsel more interested in endeavouring to find out.
how her mourning-robe became her than in the dismal ceremony for which they were preparing. Neither was this propensity (if we must needs confess the truth) at all diminished by the appearance of two strange knights, which occasioned some looking up, peeping, and whispering. Rowena alone, too proud to be vain, paid her greeting to her deliverer with a graceful courtesy. Her demeanour was serious, but not dejected; and it may be doubted whether thoughts of Ivanhoe, and the uncertainty of his fate, did not claim as great a share in her gravity as the death of her kinsman.

To Cedric, who, however, as we have observed, was not remarkably clear-sighted on such occasions, the sorrow of his ward seemed so much deeper than any of the other maidens that he deemed it proper to whisper the explanation, "She was the affianced bride of the noble Athelstane." It may be doubted whether this communication went a far way to increase Wilfred's disposition to sympathise with the mourners of Coningsburgh.

Having thus formally introduced the guests to the different chambers in which the obsequies of Athelstane were celebrated under different forms, Cedric conducted them into a small room, destined, as he informed them, for the exclusive accommodation of honourable guests, whose more slight connexion with the deceased might render them unwilling to join those who were immediately affected by the unhappy event. He assured them of every accommodation, and was about to withdraw when the Black Knight took his hand.

"I crave to remind you, noble thane," he said, "that when we last parted you promised, for the service I had the fortune to render you, to grant me a boon."

"It is granted ere named, noble Knight," said Cedric; "yet, at this sad moment——"

"Of that also," said the King, "I have beheld me;"
but my time is brief; neither does it seem to me unfit that, when closing the grave on the noble Athelstane, we should deposit therein certain prejudices and hasty opinions."

"Sir Knight of the Fetterlock," said Cedric, colouring, and interrupting the King in his turn, "I trust your boon regards yourself and no other; for in that which concerns the honour of my house, it is scarce fitting that a stranger should mingle."

"Nor do I wish to mingle," said the King, mildly, "unless in so far as you will admit me to have an interest. As yet you have known me but as the Black Knight of the Fetterlock. Know me now as Richard Plantagenet."

"Richard of Anjou!" exclaimed Cedric, stepping backward with the utmost astonishment.

"No, noble Cedric—Richard of England! whose deepest interest—whose deepest wish, is to see her sons united with each other. And, how now, worthy thane! hast thou no knee for thy prince?"

"To Norman blood," said Cedric, "it hath never bended."

"Reserve thine homage then," said the Monarch, "until I shall prove my right to it by my equal protection of Normans and English."

"Prince," answered Cedric, "I have ever done justice to thy bravery and thy worth. Nor am I ignorant of thy claim to the crown through thy descent from Matilda, niece to Edgar Atheling, and daughter to Malcolm of Scotland. But Matilda, though of the royal Saxon blood, was not the heir to the monarchy."

"I will not dispute my title with thee, noble thane," said Richard, calmly; "but I will bid thee look around thee, and see where thou wilt find another to be put into the scale against it."

"And hast thou wandered hither, Prince, to tell me so?" said Cedric—"to upbraid me with the ruin of my race, e the grave has closed o'er the last scion of Saxon royalty?" His countenance darkened as he spoke. "It was boldly—it was rashly done!"

"Not so, by the holy rood!" replied the King; "it was done in the frank confidence which one brave man may repose in another, without a shadow of danger."

"Thou sayest well, Sir King—for King I own thou art, and wilt be, despite of my feeble opposition. I dare not take the only mode to prevent it, though thou hast placed the strong temptation within my reach!"

"And now to my boon," said the King, "which I ask not with one jot the less confidence, that thou hast refused to acknowledge my lawful sovereignty. I require of thee, as a man of thy word, on pain of being held faithless, man-sworn, and nidering,¹ to forgive and receive to thy paternal affection the good knight, Wilfred of Ivanhoe. In this reconciliation thou wilt own I have an interest—the happiness of my friend, and the quelling of dissension among my faithful people."

"And this is Wilfred!" said Cedric, pointing to his son. "My father!—my father!" said Ivanhoe, prostrating himself at Cedric's feet, "grant me thy forgiveness!"

"Thou hast it, my son," said Cedric, raising him up. "The son of Hereward knows how to keep his word, even when it has been passed to a Norman. But let me see thee use the dress and costume of thy English ancestry: no short cloaks, no gay bonnets, no fantastic plumage in my decent household. He that would be the son of Cedric must show himself of English ancestry. Thou art about to speak," he added, sternly, "and I guess the topic. The Lady Rowena must complete two years' mourning, as for a betrothed husband; all our Saxon ancestors would disown us were we to treat of a new union for her ere the grave of him she should have wedded—him so much the most worthy of her hand by birth and ancestry—is yet closed."

¹ Nidering. Infamous. [Scott.]
Aethelstane himself would burst his bloody cerements, and stand before us to forbid such dishonour to his memory."

It seemed as if Cedric's words had raised a spectre; for scarce had he uttered them ere the door flew open, and Aethelstane, arrayed in the garments of the grave, stood before them, pale, haggard, and like something arisen from the dead!

The effect of this apparition on the persons present was utterly appalling. Cedric started back as far as the wall of the apartment would permit, and, leaning against it as one unable to support himself, gazed on the figure of his friend with eyes that seemed fixed, and a mouth which he appeared incapable of shutting. Ivanhoe crossed himself, repeating prayers in Saxon, Latin, or Norman-French, as they occurred to his memory, while Richard alternately said "Bénéfice," and swore, "Mort de ma vie!"

In the mean time a horrible noise was heard below stairs, some crying, "Secure the treacherous monks!"—others, "Down with them into the dungeon!"—others, "Pitch them from the highest battlements!"

"In the name of God!" said Cedric, addressing what seemed the spectre of his departed friend, "if thou art mortal, speak!—if a departed spirit, say for what cause thou lost revisit us, or if I can do aught that can set thy spirit to repose. Living or dead, noble Aethelstane, speak to Cedric!

"I will," said the spectre, very composedly, "when I have collected breath, and when you give me time. Alive, saidst thou? I am as much alive as he can be who has fed on bread and water for three days, which seem three ages. Yes, bread and water, father Cedric! By Heaven, and all saints in it, better food hath not passed my weasand for

---

1. DEAD. The resuscitation of Aethelstane has been much criticised, as too violent a breach of probability, even for a work of such fantastic character. It was a tour-de-force to which the author was compelled to have recourse by vehement entreaties of his friend and printer, (James Ballantyne,) who was inconsolable on the Saxon being conveyed to the tomb. [Scott.]

2. MORT DE MA VIE. "Death of my life!"
three livelong days, and by God's providence it is that I am now here to tell it."

"Why, noble Athelstane," said the Black Knight, "I myself saw you struck down by the fierce Templar towards the end of the storm at Torquilstone, and, as I thought, and Wamba reported, your skull was cloven through the teeth."

"You thought amiss, Sir Knight," said Athelstane, "and Wamba lied. My teeth are in good order, and that my supper shall presently find. No thanks to the Templar though, whose sword turned in his hand, so that the blade struck me flatlings, being averted by the handle of the good mace with which I warded the blow; had my steel-cap been on, I had not valued it a rush, and had dealt him such a counterbuff as would have spoilt his retreat. But as it was, down I went, stunned, indeed, but unwounded. Others of both sides, were beaten down and slaughtered above me, so that I never recovered my senses until I found myself in a coffin—an open one, by good luck!—placed before the altar of the church of St. Edmund's. I sneezed repeatedly—groaned—awakened, and would have arisen, when the sacristan and abbot, full of terror, came running at the noise, surprised, doubtless, and no way pleased, to find the man alive whose heirs they had proposed themselves to be. I asked for wine; they gave me some, but it must have been highly medicated, for I slept yet more deeply than before, and wakened not for many hours. I found my arms swathed down, my feet tied so fast that mine ankles ache at the very remembrance; the place was utterly dark—the oubliette,¹ as I suppose, of their accursed convent, and from the close, stifled, damp smell I conceive it is also used for a place of sepulture. I had strange thoughts of what had befallen me, when the door of my dungeon creaked, and two villain monks entered. They would have persuaded me I was in purgatory, but I knew too well the pursy, short-breathed voice of the father abbot. St. Jeremy! how dif-

¹ OUBLIETTE. A dungeon; from French oublier, to forget.
cent from that tone with which he used to ask me for another slice of the haunch! the dog has feasted with me from Christmas to Twelfth Night.”

“Have patience, noble Athelstane,” said the King, “take breath—tell your story at leisure; beshrew me but such a tale is as well worth listening to as a romance.”

“Ay, but, by the rood of Bromholme, there was no ro-dance in the matter!” said Athelstane. “A barley loaf and pitcher of water—that they gave me, the niggardly traitors, whom my father, and I myself, had enriched, when their best resources were the flitches of bacon and measures of corn out of which they wheedled poor serfs and bond-men, in exchange for their prayers. The nest of foul, ungrateful vipers—barley bread and ditch water to such a stron as I had been! I will smoke them out of their nest, though I be excommunicated!”

“But, in the name of Our Lady, noble Athelstane,” said the friar, grasping the hand of his friend, “how didst thou escape this imminent danger? did their hearts relent?”

“Did their hearts relent!” echoed Athelstane. “Do donkeys melt with the sun? I should have been there still, not some stir in the convent, which I find was their concession hitherward to eat my funeral feast, when they knew how and where I had been buried alive, summoned the swarm out of their hive. I heard them droning their death-psalms, little judging they were sung in pect for my soul by those who were thus famishing my body. They went, however, and I waited long for food; no wonder—the gouty sacristan was even too busy with his Provender to mind mine. At length down he came, with an unstable step and a strong flavour of wine and poison about his person. Good cheer had opened his heart, he left me a nook of pasty and a flask of wine instead of a former fare. I ate, drank, and was invigorated; when, add to my good luck, the sacristan, too totty to discharge the duty of turnkey fitly, locked the door beside the staple so that it fell ajar. The light, the food, the wine set my invention to work. The staple to which my chains were fixed was more rusted than I or the villain abbot had supposed. Even iron could not remain without consuming in the damps of that infernal dungeon."

"Take breath, noble Athelstane," said Richard, "and partake of some refreshment, ere you proceed with a tale so dreadful."

"Partake!" quoth Athelstane. "I have been partaking five times to-day; and yet a morsel of that savoury ham were not altogether foreign to the matter: and I pray you, fair sir, to do me reason in a cup of wine."

The guests, though still agape with astonishment, pledged their resuscitated landlord, who thus proceeded in his story. He had indeed now many more auditors than those to whom it was commenced, for Edith, having given certain necessary orders for arranging matters within the castle, had followed the dead-alive up to the strangers’ apartment, attended by as many of the guests, male and female, as could squeeze into the small room, while others, crowding the staircase, caught up an erroneous edition of the story, and transmitted it still more inaccurately to those beneath, who again sent it forth to the vulgar without, in a fashion totally irreconcilable to the real fact. Athelstane, however, went on as follows with the history of his escape:

"Finding myself freed from the staple, I dragged myself upstairs as well as a man loaded with shackles, and emaciated with fasting, might; and after much groping about, I was at length directed, by the sound of a jolly roundelay, to the apartment where the worthy sacristan, an it please ye, was holding a devil’s mass with a huge beetle-browed, broad-shouldered brother of the grey-trock and cowl, who looked much more like a thief than a clergyman. I burst in upon them, and the fashion of my grave-clothes, as well as the clanking of my chains, made me more resemble an inhabitant of the other world than of this. Both stood aghast; but when I knocked down the sacristan with my fist, the other fellow, his pot-companion, fetched a blow at me with a huge quarter-staff.”

“This must be our Friar Tuck, for a count’s ransom,” said Richard, looking at Ivanhoe.

“He may be the devil, an he will,” said Athelstane.
“Fortunately, he missed the aim; and on my approaching to grapple with him, took to his heels and ran for it. I failed not to set my own heels at liberty by means of the fetterkey, which hung amongst others at the sexton’s belt; and I had thoughts of beating out the knave’s brains with the bunch of keys, but gratitude for the nook of pasty and the flask of wine which the rascal had imparted to my captivity came over my heart; so, with a brace of hearty kicks, I left him on the floor, pouched some baked meat and a leathern bottle of wine, with which the two venerable brethren had been regaling, went to the stable and found in a private stall mine own best palfrey, which, doubtless, had been set apart for the holy father abbot’s particular use. Hither I came with all the speed the beast could compass—man and mother’s son flying before me wherever I came, taking me for a spectre, the more especially as, to prevent my being recognised, I drew the corpse-hood over my face. I had not gained admittance into my own castle, had I not been supposed to be the attendant of a juggler who is making the people in the castle-yard very merry, considering they are assembled to celebrate their lord’s funeral. I say the sewer thought I was dressed to bear a part in the tregetour’s\footnote{Tregetour’s. Juggler’s.} mummery, and so I got admission, and I did but disclose myself to my mother, and eat a hasty morsel, ere I came in quest of you, my noble friend.”

“And you have found me,” said Cedric, “ready to resume our brave projects of honour and liberty. I tell thee, never will dawn a morrow so auspicious as the next for the deliverance of the noble Saxon race.”

“Talk not to me of delivering any one,” said Athelstane; “it is well I am delivered myself. I am more intent on punishing that villain abbot. He shall hang on the top of this Castle of Coningsburgh, in his cope and stole; and if the stairs be too strait to admit his fat carcass, I will have him craned up from without.”

“But, my son,” said Edith, “consider his sacred office.”

“Consider my three days’ fast,” replied Athelstane; “I will have their blood every one of them. Front-de-Bœuf was burnt alive for a less matter, for he kept a good table for his prisoners, only put too much garlic in his last dish of pottage. But these hypocritical, ungrateful slaves, so often the self-invited flatterers at my board, who gave me neither pottage nor garlic, more or less—they die, by the soul of Hengist!”

“But the Pope, my noble friend,” said Cedric—

“But the devil, my noble friend,” answered Athelstane; “they die, and no more of them. Were they the best monks upon earth, the world would go on without them.”

“For shame, noble Athelstane,” said Cedric; “forget such wretches in the career of glory which lies open before thee. Tell this Norman prince, Richard of Anjou, that, lion-hearted as he is, he shall not hold undisputed the throne of Alfred, while a male descendant of the Holy Confessor lives to dispute it.”

“How!” said Athelstane, “is this the noble King Richard?”

“It is Richard Plantagenet himself,” said Cedric; “yet I need not remind thee that, coming hither a guest of free-will, he may neither be injured nor detained prisoner: thou well knowest thy duty to him as his host.”

“Ay, by my faith!” said Athelstane; “and my duty as a subject besides, for I here tender him my allegiance, heart and hand.”
“My son,” said Edith, “think on thy royal rights!”

“Think on the freedom of England, degenerate prince!” said Cedric.

“Mother and friend,” said Athelstane, “a truce to your upbraidings! Bread and water and a dungeon are marvelous mortifiers of ambition, and I rise from the tomb a wiser man than I descended into it. One half of those vain ollies were puffed into mine ear by that perfidious Abbot Wilfram, and you may now judge if he is a counsellor to be trusted. Since these plots were set in agitation, I have had nothing but hurried journeys, indigestions, blows and bruises, imprisonments, and starvation; besides that they can only end in the murder of some thousands of quiet folk. Tell you, I will be king in my own domains, and nowhere else; and my first act of dominion shall be to hang the abbot.”

“And my ward Rowena,” said Cedric—“I trust you intend not to desert her?”

“Father Cedric,” said Athelstane, “be reasonable. The lady Rowena cares not for me; she loves the little finger of my kinsman Wilfred’s glove better than my whole person. There she stands to avouch it. Nay, blush not, kinswoman; there is no shame in loving a courtly knight better than a country franklin; and do not laugh neither, Rowena, or grave-clothes and a thin visage are, God knows, no matter of merriment. Nay, an thou wilt needs laugh, I will lend thee a better jest. Give me thy hand, or rather lend it me, for I but ask it in the way of friendship. Here, cousin Wilfred of Ivanhoe, in thy favour I renounce and abjure—— Hey, by St. Dunstan, our cousin Wilfred hath vanished! Yet, unless my eyes are still dazzled with the fasting I have undergone, I saw him stand there but even now.”

All now looked around and inquired for Ivanhoe; but he had vanished. It was at length discovered that a Jew had been to seek him; and that, after very brief conference, he had called for Gurth and his armour, and had left the castle.

"Fair cousin," said Athelstane to Rowena, "could I think that this sudden disappearance of Ivanhoe was occasioned by other than the weightiest reason, I would myself resume——"

But he had no sooner let go her hand, on first observing that Ivanhoe had disappeared, than Rowena, who had found her situation extremely embarrassing, had taken the first opportunity to escape from the apartment.

"Certainly," quoth Athelstane, "women are the least to be trusted of all animals, monks and abbots excepted. I am an infidel, if I expected not thanks from her, and perhaps a kiss to boot. These cursed grave-clothes have surely a spell on them, every one flies from me. To you I turn, noble King Richard, with the vows of allegiance, which, as a liege subject——"

But King Richard was gone also, and no one knew whither. At length it was learned that he had hastened to the courtyard, summoned to his presence the Jew who had spoken with Ivanhoe, and, after a moment’s speech with him, had called vehemently to horse, thrown himself upon a steed, compelled the Jew to mount another, and set off at a rate which, according to Wamba, rendered the old Jew’s neck not worth a penny’s purchase.

"By my halidome!" said Athelstane, "it is certain that Zernebock hath possessed himself of my castle in my absence. I return in my grave-clothes, a pledge restored from the very sepulchre, and every one I speak to vanishes as soon as they hear my voice! But it skills not talking of it. Come, my friends, such of you as are left, follow me to the banquet-hall, lest any more of us disappear. It is. I trust, as yet tolerably furnished, as becomes the obsequies of an ancient Saxon noble; and should we tarry any longer, who knows but the devil may fly off with the supper?"
CHAPTER XLIII

Be Mowbray's sins so heavy in his bosom,
That they may break his foaming courser's back,
And throw the rider headlong in the lists,
A caitiff recreant!

Richard II.

Our scene now returns to the exterior of the castle, or ceptory, of Templestowe, about the hour when the likely die was to be cast for the life or death of Rebecca.

as a scene of bustle and life, as if the whole vicinity had ed forth its inhabitants to a village wake or rural feast.
the earnest desire to look on blood and death is not liar to those dark ages; though, in the gladiatorial exe of single combat and general tourney, they were utated to the bloody spectacle of brave men falling by other's hands. Even in our own days, when morals better understood, an execution, a bruising-match, a or a meeting of radical reformers, collects, at consider-hazard to themselves, immense crowds of spectators, wise little interested, except to see how matters are to ducted, or whether the heroes of the day are, in the ic language of insurgent tailors, "flints" or "dung-

The eyes, therefore, of a very considerable multitude ent on the gate of the preceptory of Templestowe, the purpose of witnessing the procession; while still eter numbers had already surrounded the tiltyard being to that establishment. This inclosure was formed piece of level ground adjoining to the preceptory,

583
which had been levelled with care, for the exercise of military and chivalrous sports. It occupied the brow of a soft and gentle eminence, was carefully palisaded around, and, as the Templars willingly invited spectators to be witnesses of their skill in feats of chivalry, was amply supplied with galleries and benches for their use.

On the present occasion a throne was erected for the Grand Master at the east end, surrounded with seats of distinction for the preceptors and knights of the order. Over these floated the sacred standard, called Le Beau-seant, which was the ensign, as its name was the battle-cry, of the Templars.

At the opposite end of the lists was a pile of faggots, so arranged around a stake, deeply fixed in the ground, as to leave a space for the victim whom they were destined to consume to enter within the fatal circle, in order to be chained to the stake by the fetters which hung ready for that purpose. Beside this deadly apparatus stood four black slaves, whose colour and African features, then so little known in England, appalled the multitude, who gazed on them as on demons employed about their own diabolical exercises. These men stirred not, excepting now and then, under the direction of one who seemed their chief, to shift and replace the ready fuel. They looked not on the multitude. In fact, they seemed insensible of their presence, and of everything save the discharge of their own horrible duty. And when, in speech with each other, they expanded their blubber lips, and showed their white fangs, as if they grinned at the thoughts of the expected tragedy, the startled commons could scarcely help believing that they were actually the familiar spirits with whom the witch had communed, and who, her time being out, stood ready to assist in her dreadful punishment. They whispered to each other, and communicated all the feats which Satan had performed during that busy and unhappy period, not failing, of course, to give the devil rather more than his due.
ive you not heard, father Dennet," quoth one boor to advanced in years, "that the devil has carried away the great Saxon thane Athelstane of Coningsbut he brought him back though, by the blessing and St. Dunstan."

w's that?" said a brisk young fellow, dressed in a assock embroidered with gold, and having at his stout lad bearing a harp upon his back, which bears vocation. The Minstrel seemed of no vulgar r, besides the splendour of his gaily brodered doub- bore around his neck a silver chain, by which hung st," or key, with which he tuned his harp. On his hen was a silver plate, which, instead of bearing, as e cognizance or badge of the baron to whose family ged, had barely the word SHERWOOD engraved upon ow mean you by that?" said the gay Minstrel, min- the conversation of the peasants; "I came to seek ect for my rhyme, and, by'r Lady, I were glad to well avouched," said the elder peasant, "that after one of Coningsburgh had been dead four weeks——" t is impossible," said the Minstrel; "I saw him in the passage of arms at Ashby-de-la-Zouche."

d, however, he was, or else translated," said the peasant; "for I heard the monks of St. Edmund's de the death's hymn for him; and, moreover, there was bath-meal and dole at the Castle of Coningsburgh, was; and thither had I gone, but for Mabel Parkins, dead was Athelstane," said the old man, shaking

; "and the more pity it was, for the old Saxon n your story, my masters—your story," said the somewhat impatiently.
y—construe us the story," said a burly trian, who
IVANHOE

Good beside them, leaning on a pole that exhibited an appearance between a pilgrim's staff and a quarter-staff, and probably acted as either when occasion served—"your story," said the stalwart churchman. "Burn not daylight about it; we have short time to spare."

"An please your reverence," said Dennet, "a drunken priest came to visit the sacristan at St. Edmund's—"

"It does not please my reverence," answered the churchman, "that there should be such an animal as a drunken priest, or, if there were, that a layman should so speak. Be mannerly, my friend, and conclude the holy man or unsteady, as if the stomach were filled with wine, have felt it myself."

"Well, then," answered father Dennet, "a holy brother came to visit the sacristan at St. Edmund's—a small hedge-priest is the visitor, and kills half the deer that are stolen in the forest, who loves the tinkling of a pikket better than the sacring-bell; and deems a fitchet of ten worth ten of his breviary; for the rest, a good fellow merry, who will flourish a quarter-staff, draw a bow, and dance a Cheshire round with e'er a man in Yorkshire—"

"That last part of thy speech, Dennet," said Minstrel, "has saved thee a rib or twain."

"Tush, man, I fear him not," said Dennet; "I know what old and stiff, but when I fought for the beak at Doncaster—"

"But the story—the story, my friend," said Minstrel. "Why, the tale is but this—Athelstane of Coningsburgh was buried at St. Edmund's."

"That's a lie, and a loud one," said the friar, "him borne to his own Castle of Coningsburgh, Nay, then, e'en tell the story yourself, Minstrel."

[MISSING PAGE]
and Dennet, turning sulky at these repeated contradictions; and it was with some difficulty that the boor could be prevailed on, by the request of his comrade and the Minstrel, to renew his tale. “These two sober friars,” said he at length, “since this reverend man will needs have them all, had continued drinking good ale, and wine, and what not, for the best part of a summer’s day, when they were aroused by a deep groan, and a clanking of chains, and the minstrel of the deceased Athelstane entered the apartment, saying, ‘Ye evil shepherds——!’”

“It is false,” said the friar, hastily, “he never spoke a word.”

“So ho! Friar Tuck,” said the Minstrel, drawing him apart from the rustics; “we have started a new hare, I find.”

“I tell thee, Allan-a-Dale,” said the hermit, “I saw Athelstane of Coningsburgh as much as bodily eyes ever saw living man. He had his shroud on, and all about him melt of the sepulchre. A butt of sack will not wash it out of my memory.”

“Pshaw!” answered the Minstrel; “thou dost but jest with me!”

“Never believe me,” said the Friar, “an I fetched not a stock at him with my quarter-staff that would have felled an ox, and it glided through his body as it might through a pillar of smoke!”

“By St. Hubert,” said the Minstrel, “but it is a won-rous tale, and fit to be put in metre to the ancient tune, sorrow came to the Old Friar.”

“Laugh, if ye list,” said Friar Tuck; “but an ye catch me dazing on such a theme may the next ghost or devil carry me off with him headlong! No, no—I instantly formed the purpose of assisting at some good work, such as the burning of a witch, a judicial combat, or the like matter of bodily service, and therefore am I here.”

As they thus conversed, the heavy bell of the church of St. Michael of Templestowe, a venerable building, situated hamlet at some distance from the preceptory, broke their argument. One by one the sullen sounds fell excisively on the ear, leaving but sufficient space for each die away in distant echo, ere the air was again filled.
IVANHOE

petition of the iron knell. These sounds, the signal approaching ceremony, chilled with awe the heart assembled multitude, whose eyes were now turned to preceptory, expecting the approach of the Grand Ma

the champion, and the criminal.

At length the drawbridge fell, the gates opened,

knight, bearing the great standard of the order, sallic castle, preceded by six trumpets, and followed knights, preceptors, two and two, the Grand Master

last, mounted on a stately horse, whose furniture

the simplest kind. Behind him came Brian de B bert, armed cap-à-pie in bright armour, but with esquires behind him. His face, though partly hid long plume which floated down from his barret-

a strong and mingled expression of passion, in v seemed to contend with irresolution. He looked

d pale, as if he had not slept for several nights, y

pawing war-horse with the habitual ease and grace

the best lance of the order of the Temple. His pearance was grand and commanding; but, lo,

with attention, men read that in his dark e

which they willingly withdrew their eyes.

On either side rode Conrado of Mont-Fite

de Malvoisin, who acted as godfathers to a

They were in their robes of peace, the whi order. Behind them followed other con

Temple, with a long train of esquires and black, aspirants to the honour of being on the order. After these neophytes came a on foot, in the same sable livery, amid

1 BARET-CAP. A flat cap of peculiar form.
might be seen the pale form of the accused, moving with a dow but undismayed step towards the scene of her fate.
he was stript of all her ornaments, lest perchance there ould be among them some of those amulets which Satan as supposed to bestow upon his victims, to deprive them of power of confession even when under the torture. A arse white dress, of the simplest form, had been substi-ted for her Oriental garments; yet there was such an exquisite mixture of courage and resignation in her look that en in this garb, and with no other ornament than her ng black tresses, each eye wept that looked upon her, and most hardened bigot regretted the fate that had converted a creature so goodly into a vessel of wrath, and a aged slave of the devil.

A crowd of inferior personages belonging to the precep-ry followed the victim, all moving with the utmost order,
th arms folded and looks bent upon the ground.

This slow procession moved up the gentle eminence, on summit of which was the tiltyard, and, entering the sts, marched once around them from right to left, and then they had completed the circle, made a halt. There as then a momentary bustle, while the Grand Master and his attendants, excepting the champion and his god-thers, dismounted from their horses, which were immeately removed out of the lists by the esquires, who were in attendance for that purpose.

The unfortunate Rebecca was conducted to the black hair placed near the pile. On her first glance at the ter-ible spot where preparations were making for a death alike dismaying to the mind and painful to the body, she was observed to shudder and shut her eyes, praying internally, doubtless, for her lips moved, though no speech was heard.
In the space of a minute she opened her eyes, looked fixedly on the pile as if to familiarise her mind with the object, and en slowly and naturally turned away her head.

Meanwhile, the Grand Master had assumed his seat; and when the chivalry of his order was placed around and behind him, each in his due rank, a loud and long flourish of the trumpets announced that the court were seated for judgment. Malvoisin then, acting as godfather of the champion, stepped forward, and laid the glove of the Jewess, which was the pledge of battle, at the feet of the Grand Master.

"Valorous lord and reverend father," said he, "standeth the good knight, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, Knight Preceptor of the Order of the Temple, who, by accepting the pledge of battle which I now lay at your reverence's feet, hath become bound to do his devoir in combat this day. I maintain that this Jewish maiden, by name Rebecca, justly deserved the doom passed upon her in a chapter of this most holy order of the Temple of Zion, condemning her to die as a sorceress—here, I say, he standeth, such is the devoir to do, knightly and honourable, if such be your noble sanctified pleasure."

"Hath he made oath," said the Grand Master, "that his quarrel is just and honourable? Bring forward the Teigitur."

"Sir and most reverend father," answered Gilbert readily, "our brother here present hath already given the truth of his accusation in the hand of the good Conrade de Mont-Fitchet; and otherwise he owes no oath, seeing that his adversary is an unbroken man."

This explanation was satisfactory, to Albert. The wily knight had foreseen the great impossibility, of prevailing upon Brian de Bois-Guilbert to take such an oath before the assembly invented this excuse to escape the necessity of doing so.

The Grand Master, having allowed the apostate Malvoisin, commanded the herald to stand forth. The Teigitur, "Thess therefore": the book of service ushers forth.
The trumpets then again flourished, and a herald, stepping forward, proclaimed aloud: "Oyez, oyez, oyez." Here standeth the good knight, Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, ready to do battle with any knight of free blood who will sustain the quarrel allowed and allotted to the Jewess Rebecca, to try by champion, in respect of lawful essoins of her own body; and to such champion the reverend and glorious Grand Master here present allows a fair field, and equal partition of sun and wind, and whatever else appertains to a fair combat." The trumpets again sounded, and there was a dead pause of many minutes.

"No champion appears for the appelant," said the Grand Master. "Go, herald, and ask her whether she expects any one to do battle for her in this her cause."

The herald went to the chair in which Rebecca was seated; and Bois-Guilbert, suddenly turning his horse's head toward that end of the lists, in spite of hints on either side from Malvoisin and Mont-Fitchet, was by the side of Rebecca's chair as soon as the herald.

"Is this regular, and according to the law of combat?" said Malvoisin, looking to the Grand Master.

"Albert de Malvoisin, it is," answered Beaumanoir; "for in this appeal to the judgment of God we may not prohibit parties from having that communication with each other which may best tend to bring forth the truth of the quarrel."

In the mean time, the herald spoke to Rebecca in these terms: "Damsel, the honourable and reverend the Grand Master demands of thee, if thou art prepared with a champion to do battle this day in thy behalf, or if thou dost yield thee as one justly condemned to a deserved doom?"

"Say to the Grand Master," replied Rebecca, "that I maintain my innocence, and do not yield me as justly condemned lest I become guilty of mine own blood. Say to..."
him, that I challenge such delay as his forms will permit, to see if God, whose opportunity is in man's extremity, will raise me up a deliverer; and when such uttermost space is passed, may His holy will be done!"

The herald retired to carry this answer to the Grand Master.

"God forbid," said Lucas Beaumanoir, "that Jew or Pagan should impeach us of injustice! Until the shadows be cast from the west to the eastward, will we wait to see if a champion shall appear for this unfortunate woman. When the day is so far passed, let her prepare for death."

The herald communicated the words of the Grand Master to Rebecca, who bowed her head submissively, folded her arms, and, looking up towards heaven, seemed to expect that aid from above which she could scarce promise herself from man. During this awful pause, the voice of Bois-Guilbert broke upon her ear; it was but a whisper, yet it startled her more than the summons of the herald had appeared to do.

"Rebecca," said the Templar, "dost thou hear me?"

"I have no portion in thee, cruel, hard-hearted man," said the unfortunate maiden.

"Ay, but dost thou understand my words?" said the Templar; "for the sound of my voice is frightful in mine own ears. I scarce know on what ground we stand, or for what purpose they have brought us hither. This listless space—that chair—these faggots—I know their purpose, and yet it appears to me like something unreal—the fearful picture of a vision, which appals my sense with hideous fantasies, but convinces not my reason."

"My mind and senses keep touch and time," answered Rebecca, "and tell me alike that these faggots are destined to consume my earthly body, and open a painful but a brief passage to a better world."

"Dreams, Rebecca—dreams," answered the Templar—"idle visions, rejected by the wisdom of your own wiser sib-Hear me, Rebecca,” he said, proceeding with an in; “a better chance hast thou for life and liberty than her knaves and dotard dream of. Mount thee behind on my steed—on Zamor, the gallant horse that never his rider. I won him in single fight from the Soldan ezibond. Mount, I say, behind me; in one short hour that and inquiry far behind—a new world of pleasure to thee—to me a new career of fame. Let them the doom which I despise, and erase the name of Bois- bert from their list of monastic slaves! I will wash out blood whatever blot they may dare to cast on my neon.”

“Tempter,” said Rebecca, “begone! Not in this last empty canst thou move me one hair’s-breadth from my g-place. Surrounded as I am by foes, I hold thee as worst and most deadly enemy; avoid thee, in the name of God!”

Gilbert Malvoisin, alarmed and impatient at the duration of the conference, now advanced to interrupt it.

Hath the maiden acknowledged her guilt?” he deered of Bois-Guilbert; “or is she resolute in her denial?” she is indeed resolute,” said Bois-Guilbert.

Then,” said Malvoisin, “must thou, noble brother, rethy place to attend the issue. The shades are changen the circle of the dial. Come, brave Bois-Guilbert—thou hope of our holy order, and soon to be its head.”

As he spoke in this soothing tone, he laid his hand on night’s bridle, as if to lead him back to his station.

“False villain! what meanest thou by thy hand on my said Sir Brian, angrily. And shaking off his comin’s grasp, he rode back to the upper end of the lists.

There is yet spirit in him,” said Malvoisin apart to Fitchet, “were it well directed; but, like the Greek burns whatever approaches it.”

The judges had now been two hours in the lists, awaitvain the appearance of a champion.
“And reason good,” said Friar Tuck, “seeing she is a Jewess; and yet, by mine order, it is hard that so young and beautiful a creature should perish without one blow being struck in her behalf! Were she ten times a witch, provided she were but the least bit of a Christian, my quarter-staff should ring noon on the steel cap of yonder fierce Templar, ere he carried the matter off thus.”

It was, however, the general belief that no one could or would appear for a Jewess accused of sorcery; and the knights, instigated by Malvoisin, whispered to each other that it was time to declare the pledge of Rebecca forfeited. At this instant a knight, urging his horse to speed, appeared on the plain advancing towards the lists. A hundred voices exclaimed, “A champion!—a champion!” And, despite the prepossessions and prejudices of the multitude, they shouted unanimously as the knight rode into the tiltyard. The second glance, however, served to destroy the hope that his timely arrival had excited. His horse, urged for many miles to its utmost speed, appeared to reel from fatigue, and the rider, however undauntedly he presented himself in the lists, either from weakness, weariness, or both, seemed scarce able to support himself in the saddle.

To the summons of the herald, who demanded his name, and purpose, the stranger knight answered readily and boldly: “I am a good knight and noble, come hither to sustain with lance and sword the just and lawful quarrel of this damsel, Rebecca, daughter of Isaac of York; to uphold the doom pronounced against her to be false and truthless, and to defy Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, as a traitor, murderer, and liar; as I will prove in this field with my body against his, by the aid of God, of Our Lady, and of Monseigneur St. George, the good knight.”

“The stranger must first show,” said Malvoisin, “that he is good knight, and of honourable lineage. The Temple sendeth not forth her champions against nameless men.”
“My name,” said the knight, raising his helmet, “is better known, my lineage more pure, Malvoisin, than thine own. I am Wilfred of Ivanhoe.”

“I will not fight with thee at present,” said the Templar, in a changed and hollow voice. “Get thy wounds healed, purvey thee a better horse, and it may be I will hold it worth my while to scourge out of thee this boyish spirit of bravado.”

“Ha! proud Templar,” said Ivanhoe, “hast thou forgotten that twice didst thou fall before this lance? Remember the lists at Acre; remember the passage of arms at Ashby; remember thy proud vaunt in the halls of Rotherwood, and the gage of your gold chain against my reliquary, that thou wouldst do battle with Wilfred of Ivanhoe, and recover the honour thou hadst lost! By that reliquary, and the holy relic it contains, I will proclaim thee, Templar, a coward in every court in Europe—in every preceptory of thine order—unless thou do battle without farther delay.”

Bois-Guilbert turned his countenance irresolutely towards Rebecca, and then exclaimed, looking fiercely at Ivanhoe: “Dog of a Saxon! take thy lance, and prepare for the death thou hast drawn upon thee!”

“Does the Grand Master allow me the combat?” said Ivanhoe.

“I may not deny what thou hast challenged,” said the Grand Master, “provided the maiden accepts thee as he champion. Yet I would thou wert in better plight to do battle. An enemy of our order hast thou ever been, ye would I have thee honourably met with.”

“Thus—thus as I am, and not otherwise,” said Ivanhoe; “it is the judgment of God—to His keeping I commend myself. Rebecca,” said he, riding up to the fatal chair, “dost thou accept of me for thy champion?”

“I do,” she said—“I do,” fluttered by an emotion which the fear of death had been unable to produce—“I do accept thee as the champion whom Heaven hath sent me. Yet, no—no—thy wounds are uncured. Meet not that proud man; why shouldst thou perish also?"

But Ivanhoe was already at his post, and had closed his visor, and assumed his lance. Bois-Guilbert did the same; and his esquire remarked, as he clasped his visor, that his face, which had, notwithstanding the variety of emotions by which he had been agitated, continued during the whole morning of an ashy paleness, was now become suddenly very much flushed.

The herald then, seeing each champion in his place, uplifted his voice, repeating thrice: "Faites vos devoirs, preux chevaliers!" After the third cry, he withdrew to one side of the lists, and again proclaimed that none, on peril of instant death, should dare by word, cry, or action to interfere with or disturb this fair field of combat. The Grand Master, who held in his hand the gage of battle, Rebecca's glove, now threw it into the lists, and pronounced the fatal signal words, Laissez aller.

The trumpets sounded, and the knights charged each other in full career. The wearied horse of Ivanhoe, and its no less exhausted rider, went down, as all had expected, before the well-aimed lance and vigorous steed of the Templar. This issue of the combat all had foreseen; but although the spear of Ivanhoe did but, in comparison, touch the shield of Bois-Guilbert, that champion, to the astonishment of all who beheld it, reeled in his saddle, lost his stirrups, and fell in the lists.

Ivanhoe, extricating himself from his fallen horse, was soon on foot, hastening to mend his fortune with his sword; but his antagonist arose not. Wilfred, placing his foot on his breast, and the sword's point to his throat, commanded him to yield him, or die on the spot. Bois-Guilbert returned no answer.

"Slay him not, Sir Knight," cried the Grand Master, “unshriven and unabsolved; kill not body and soul! We allow him vanquished.”

He descended into the lists, and commanded them to unhelm the conquered champion. His eyes were closed; the dark red flush was still on his brow. As they looked on him in astonishment, the eyes opened; but they were fixed and glazed. The flush passed from his brow, and gave way to the pallid hue of death. Unscathed by the lance of his enemy, he had died a victim to the violence of his own contending passions.

“This is indeed the judgment of God,” said the Grand Master, looking upwards—"Fiat voluntas tua!"

1 Fiat voluntas tua. "Thy will be done!"
CHAPTER XLIV

So! now 'tis ended, like an old wife's story.

WEBSTER.

When the first moments of surprise were over, Wilfred of Ivanhoe demanded of the Grand Master, as judge of the field, if he had manfully and rightfully done his duty in the combat.

"Manfully and rightfully hath it been done," said the Grand Master; "I pronounce the maiden free and guiltless. The arms and the body of the deceased knight are at the will of the victor."

"I will not despoil him of his weapons," said the Knight of Ivanhoe, "nor condemn his corpse to shame: he hath fought for Christendom. God's arm, no human hand, hath this day struck him down. But let his obsequies be private, as becomes those of a man who died in an unjust quarrel. And for the maiden——"

He was interrupted by a clattering of horses' feet, advancing in such numbers, and so rapidly, as to shake the ground before them; and the Black Knight galloped into the lists. He was followed by a numerous band of men-at-arms, and several knights in complete armour.

"I am too late," he said, looking around him. "I had doomed Bois-Guilbert for mine own property. Ivanhoe was this well, to take on thee such a venture, and thou scarce able to keep thy saddle?"

"Heaven, my Liege," answered Ivanhoe, "hath taken this proud man for its victim. He was not to be honoured in dying as your will had designed."

"Peace be with him," said Richard, looking steadily.
on the corpse, "if it may be so; he was a gallant knight, and has died in his steel harness full knightly. But we must waste no time. Bohun, do thine office!"

A knight stepped forward from the King's attendants, and, laying his hand on the shoulder of Albert de Malvoisin, said, "I arrest thee of high treason."

The Grand Master had hitherto stood astonished at the appearance of so many warriors. He now spoke.

"Who dares to arrest a knight of the Temple of Zion, within the girth of his own preceptory, and in the presence of the Grand Master? and by whose authority is this bold outrage offered?"

"I make the arrest," replied the knight—"I, Henry Bohun, Earl of Essex, Lord High Constable of England."

"And he arrests Malvoisin," said the King, raising his voice, "by the order of Richard Plantagenet, here present. Conrade Mont-Fitchet, it is well for thee thou art born no subject of mine. But for thee, Malvoisin, thou diest with thy brother Philip ere the world be a week older."

"I will resist thy doom," said the Grand Master.

"Proud Templar," said the King, "thou canst not: look up, and behold the royal standard of England floats over thy towers instead of thy Temple banner! Be wise, Beau-nanoir, and make no bootless opposition. Thy hand is in the lion's mouth."

"I will appeal to Rome against thee," said the Grand Master, "for usurpation on the immunities and privileges of our order."

"Be it so," said the King; "but for thine own sake tax me not with usurpation now. Dissolve thy chapter, and depart with thy followers to thy next preceptory, if thou canst find one which has not been made the scene of treasonable conspiracy against the King of England. Or, if thou wilt, remain, to share our hospitality, and behold our justice."
“To be a guest in the house where I should command?” said the Templar; “never! Chaplains, raise the Psalm, Quare fremuerunt gentes? Knights, squires, and followers of the Holy Temple, prepare to follow the banner of Beau-seant!”

The Grand Master spoke with a dignity which confronted even that of England’s king himself, and inspired courage into his surprised and dismayed followers. They gathered around him like the sheep around the watch-dog, when they hear the baying of the wolf. But they evinced not the timidity of the scared flock: there were dark brows of defiance, and looks which menaced the hostility they dared not to proffer in words. They drew together in a dark line of spears, from which the white cloaks of the knights were visible among the dusky garments of their retainers, like the lighter-coloured edges of a sable cloud. The multitude, who had raised a clamorous shout of repro- bation, paused and gazed in silence on the formidable and experienced body to which they had unwarily bade defiance, and shrunk back from their front.

The Earl of Essex, when he beheld them pause in their assembled force, dashed the rowels into his charger’s sides, and galloped backwards and forwards to array his followers, in opposition to a band so formidable. Richard alone, as if he loved the danger his presence had provoked, rode slowly along the front of the Templars, calling aloud: “What, sirs! Among so many gallant knights, will none dare to splinter a spear with Richard? Sirs of the Temple! your ladies are but sunburned, if they are not worth the shiver of a broken lance!”

“The brethren of the Temple,” said the Grand Master, riding forward in advance of their body, “fight not on such idle and profane quarrel; and not with thee, Richard of England, shall a Templar cross lance in my presence. The Pope and princes of Europe shall judge our quarrel, and Quare, etc. "Why do the heathen rage?" See Psalms 11.1.

ether a Christian prince has done well in bucklering the se which thou hast to-day adopted. If unassailed, we art assailing no one. To thine honour we refer the hour and household goods of the order which we leave ind us, and on thy conscience we lay the scandal and ence thou hast this day given to Christendom."

With these words, and without waiting a reply, the and Master gave the signal of departure. Their trum-sounded a wild march, of an Oriental character, which med the usual signal for the Templars to advance.
ey changed their array from a line to a column of march, moved off as slowly as their horses could step, as if to w it was only the will of their Grand Master, and no of the opposing and superior force, which compelled m to withdraw.

"By the splendour of Our Lady's brow!" said King hard, "it is pity of their lives that these Templars are so trusty as they are disciplined and valiant."

The multitude, like a timid cur which waits to bark till object of its challenge has turned his back, raised a ble shout as the rear of the squadron left the ground.

During the tumult which attended the retreat of the mplars, Rebecca saw and heard nothing: she was locked the arms of her aged father, giddy, and almost senseless, the rapid change of circumstances around her. But word from Isaac at length recalled her scattered feels.

"Let us go," he said, "my dear daughter, my recovered
asure—let us go to throw ourselves at the feet of the od youth."

"Not so," said Rebecca. "Oh no—no—no! I must at this moment dare to speak to him. Alas! I should more than— No, my father, let us instantly leave evil place."

"But, my daughter," said Isaac, "to leave him who hath forth like a strong man with his spear and shield holding his life as nothing, so he might redeem thy ativity; and thou, too, the daughter of a people strange un-him and his—this is service to be thankfully acknowledged."

"It is—it is—most thankfully—most devoutly acknowledged," said Rebecca; "it shall be still more so—but not now—for the sake of thy beloved Rachael, father, grant me request—not now!"

"Nay, but," said Isaac, insisting, "they will deem me more thankless than mere dogs!"

"But thou seest, my dear father, that King Richard is present, and that——"

"True, my best—my wisest Rebecca. Let us hence, let us hence! Money he will lack, for he has just returned from Palestine, and, as they say, from prison; and pretends for exacting it, should he need any, may arise out of the simple traffic with his brother John. Away—away, let us hence!"

And hurrying his daughter in his turn, he conducted her from the lists, and by means of conveyance which had provided, transported her safely to the house of the Rabbi Nathan.

The Jewess, whose fortunes had formed the principal interest of the day, having now retired unobserved, the attention of the populace was transferred to the Black Knight. They now filled the air with "Long life to Richard with the Lion's Heart, and down with the usurping Templars!"

"Notwithstanding all this lip-loyalty," said Ivanhoe to the Earl of Essex, "it was well the King took the precaution to bring thee with him, noble Earl, and so many of the trusty followers."

The Earl smiled and shook his head.

"Gallant Ivanhoe," said Essex, "dost thou know o..."
aster so well, and yet suspect him of taking so wise a prevention! I was drawing towards York, having heard that since John was making head there, when I met King Richard, like a true knight-errant, galloping hither to achieve in his own person this adventure of the Templar and the Jewess, with his own single arm. I accompanied him with my band, almost maugre his consent.’

“And what news from York, brave Earl?” said Ivanhoe;
still the rebels bide us there?”

“No more than December’s snow will bide July’s sun,” said the Earl; “they are dispersing; and who should come sting to bring us the news, but John himself!”

“The traitor!—the ungrateful, insolent traitor!” said
Ivanhoe; “did not Richard order him into confinement?”

“Oh! he received him,” answered the Earl, “as if they did meet after a hunting party; and, pointing to me and our men-at-arms, said, ‘Thou seest, brother, I have some angry men with me; thou wert best go to our mother, carry her duteous affection, and abide with her until men’s minds be pacified.’ ”

“And this was all he said?” inquired Ivanhoe; “would any one say that this prince invites men to treason by clemency?”

“Just,” replied the Earl, “as the man may be said to invite death who undertakes to fight a combat, having a dangerous wound unhealed.”

“I forgive thee the jest, Lord Earl,” said Ivanhoe; “but, member, I hazarded but my own life—Richard, the wel-

“Those,” replied Essex, “who are specially careless of their own welfare are seldom remarkably attentive to that of others. But let us haste to the castle, for Richard medites punishing some of the subordinate members of the conspiracy, though he has pardoned their principal.”

From the judicial investigations which followed on this mixture, and which are given at length in the Wardo Manuscript, it appears that Maurice de Bracy escaped beyond seas, and went into the service of Philip of France, while Philip de Malvoisin and his brother Albert, the preceptor of Templestowe, were executed, although Waldemar Fitzurse, the soul of the conspiracy, escaped with banishment, and Prince John, for whose behalf it was undertaken, was not even censured by his good-natured brother. No one, however, pitied the fate of the two Malvoisins, who only suffered the death which they had both well deserved, by many acts of falsehood, cruelty, and oppression.

Briefly after the judicial combat, Cedric the Saxon was summoned to the court of Richard, which, for the purpose of quieting the counties that had been disturbed by the ambition of his brother, was then held at York. Cedric tushed and pshawed more than once at the message, but he refused not obedience. In fact, the return of Richard had quenched every hope that he had entertained of restoring a Saxon dynasty in England; for, whatever head the Saxons might have made in the event of a civil war, it was plain that nothing could be done under the undisputed dominion of Richard, popular as he was by his personal good qualities and military fame, although his administration was wilfully careless—now too indulgent and now allied to despotism.

But, moreover, it could not escape even Cedric’s reluctant observation that his project for an absolute union among the Saxons, by the marriage of Rowena and Athelstane, was now completely at an end, by the mutual dissent of both parties concerned. This was, indeed, an event which, in his ardour for the Saxon cause, he could not have anticipated; and even when the disinclination of both was broadly and plainly manifested, he could scarce bring himself to believe that two Saxons of royal descent should scruple, on personal grounds, at an alliance so necessary for the public weal of the nation. But it was not the less certain. Rowena had always expressed her resentment to
IVANHOE 605

Athelstane, and now Athelstane was no less plain and positive in proclaiming his resolution never to pursue his addresses to the Lady Rowena. Even the natural obstinacy of Cedric sunk beneath these obstacles, where he, remaining on the point of junction, had the task of dragging a reluctant pair up to it, one with each hand. He made, however, a last vigorous attack on Athelstane, and he found that resuscitated sprout of Saxon royalty engaged, like country squires of our own day, in a furious war with the clergy.

It seems that, after all his deadly menaces against the abbot of St. Edmund's, Athelstane's spirit of revenge, what between the natural indolent kindness of his own disposition, what through the prayers of his mother Edith, attached, like most ladies (of the period), to the clerical order, had terminated in his keeping the abbot and his monks in the dungeons of Coningsburgh for three days on a meagre diet. For this atrocity the abbot menaced him with excommunication, and made out a dreadful list of complaints in the bowels and stomach, suffered by himself and his monks, in consequence of the tyrannical and unjust imprisonment they had sustained. With this controversy, and with the means he had adopted to counteract this clerical persecution, Cedric found the mind of his friend Athelstane so fully occupied, that it had no room for another tea. And when Rowena's name was mentioned, the noble Athelstane prayed leave to quaff a full goblet to her health, and that she might soon be the bride of his kinsman Wilfred. It was a desperate case, therefore. There was obviously no more to be made of Athelstane; or, as Wamba expressed it, in a phrase which has descended from Saxon times to ours, he was a cock that would not fight.

There remained betwixt Cedric and the determination which the lovers desired to come to only two obstacles—his own obstinacy, and his dislike of the Norman dynasty. The former feeling gradually gave way before the endeaments of his ward and the pride which he could not help nourishing in the fame of his son. Besides, he was not insensible to the honour of allying his own line to that of Alfred, when the superior claims of the descendant of Edward the Confessor were abandoned for ever. Cedric’s aversion to the Norman race of kings was also much undermined — first, by consideration of the impossibility of rid ing England of the new dynasty, a feeling which goes so far to create loyalty in the subject to the king de facto; and, secondly, by the personal attention of King Richard, who delighted in the blunt humour of Cedric, and, to use the language of the Wardour Manuscript, so dealt with the noble Saxon that, ere he had been a guest at court for seven days, he had given his consent to the marriage of his ward and his son Wilfred of Ivanhoe.

The nuptials of our hero, thus formally approved by his father, were celebrated in the most august of temples, the noble minster of York. The King himself attended, and, from the countenance which he afforded on this and other occasions to the distressed and hitherto degraded Saxons, gave them a safer and more certain prospect of attaining their just rights than they could reasonably hope from the precarious chance of a civil war. The church gave her full solemnities, graced with all the splendour which she of Rome knows how to apply with such brilliant effect.

Gurth, gallantly apprarelled, attended as esquire upon his young master, whom he had served so faithfully, and the magnanimous Wamba, decorated with a new cap and a most gorgeous set of silver bells. Sharers of Wilfred’s dangers and adversity, they remained, as they had a right to expect, the partakers of his more prosperous career.

But, besides this domestic retinue, these distinguished nuptials were celebrated by the attendance of the high-born Normans, as well as Saxons, joined with the universal jubilee of the lower orders, that marked the marriage of 1 De Facto. * From the fact;” actually.

individuals as a pledge of the future peace and harmony between two races, which, since that period, have been so completely mingled that the distinction has become wholly impossible. Cedric lived to see this union approximate to its completion; for, as the two nations mixed in society and formed intermarriages with each other, the English abated their scorn, and the Saxons were refined in their rusticity. But it was not until the reign of Edward the Third that the mixed language, now termed English, was spoken at the court of London, and that the dile distinction of Norman and Saxon seems entirely to have disappeared.

It was upon the second morning after this happy bridal that the Lady Rowena was made acquainted by her hand-dmaid Elgitha, that a damsel desired admission to her presen-ty, and solicited that their parley might be without witt. Rowena wondered, hesitated, became curious, and ordered by commanding the damsel to be admitted, and her attendants to withdraw.

She entered—a noble and commanding figure, the long veil, in which she was shrouded, overshadowing her more than concealing the elegance and majesty of her person. Her demeanour was that of respect, unmixed by least shade either of fear or of a wish to propitiate
her. Rowena was ever ready to acknowledge the claims, attend to the feelings, of others. She arose, and would have conducted the lovely visitor to a seat; but the stranger was at Elgitha, and again intimated a wish to discourse in the Lady Rowena alone. Elgitha had no sooner reduced unwilling steps than, to the surprise of the Lady vanhoe, her fair visitant kneeled on one knee, pressed hands to her forehead, and bending her head to her knees, in spite of Rowena’s resistance, kissed the embraced hem of her tunic.

“What means this, lady?” said the surprised bride; “or what do you offer to me a deference so unusual?”
“Because to you, Lady of Ivanhoe,” said Rebecca, rising up and resuming the usual quiet dignity of her manner, “I may lawfully, and without rebuke, pay the debt of gratitude which I owe to Wilfred of Ivanhoe. I am—for I forgive the boldness which has offered to you the homage of my country—I am the unhappy Jewess for whom your husband hazarded his life against such fearful odds in the tiltyard of Templestowe.”

“Damsel,” said Rowena, “Wilfred of Ivanhoe on that day rendered back but in slight measure your unceasing charity towards him in his wounds and misfortunes. Speak, is there aught remains in which he or I can serve thee?”

“Nothing,” said Rebecca, calmly, “unless you will transmit to him my grateful farewell.”

“You leave England, then?” said Rowena, scarce recovering the surprise of this extraordinary visit.

“I leave it, lady, ere this moon again changes. My father hath a brother high in favour with Mohammed Boabdil, King of Grenada: thither we go, secure of peace and protection, for the payment of such ransom as the Muslem exact from our people.”

“And are you not then as well protected in England?” said Rowena. “My husband has favour with the King; the King himself is just and generous.”

“Lady,” said Rebecca, “I doubt it not; but the people of England are a fierce race, quarrelling ever with their neighbours or among themselves, and ready to plunge the sword into the bowels of each other. Such is no safe abode for the children of my people. Ephraim is an heartless dove; Issachar an overlaboured drudge, which stoops between two burdens. Not in a land of war and blood, surrounded by hostile neighbours, and distracted by internal factions, can Israel hope to rest during her wanderings.”

“But you, maiden,” said Rowena—“you surely can have

1 Ephraim, etc. See Hosea VII. 11.
2 Issachar, etc. See Genesis XLIX. 14.
nothing to fear. She who nursed the sick-bed of Ivanhoe," he continued, rising with enthusiasm—"she can have nothing to fear in England, where Saxon and Norman will ontend who shall most do her honour."

"Thy speech is fair, lady," said Rebecca, "and thy purpose fairer; but it may not be—there is a gulf betwixt us. Our breeding, our faith, alike forbid either to pass over it. Farewell; yet, ere I go, indulge me one request. The bridal veil hangs over thy face; deign to raise it, and let me see the features of which fame speaks so highly."

"They are scarce worthy of being looked upon," said Rowena; "but, expecting the same from my visitant, I remove the veil."

She took it off accordingly; and, partly from the consciousness of beauty, partly from bashfulness, she blushed so intensely that cheek, brow, neck, and bosom were suffused with crimson. Rebecca blushed also; but it was a momentary feeling, and, mastered by higher emotions, past lowly from her features like the crimson cloud which hanges colour when the sun sinks beneath the horizon.

"Lady," she said, "the countenance you have deigned to show me will long dwell in my remembrance. There reigns in it gentleness and goodness; and if a tinge of the world's pride or vanities may mix with an expression so lovely, how should we chide that which is of earth for bearing some colour of its original? Long, long will I remember your features, and bless God that I leave my noble deliverer united with——"

She stopped short—her eyes filled with tears. She hastily wiped them, and answered to the anxious inquiries of Rowena: "I am well, lady—well. But my heart swells when I think of Torquilstone and the lists of Templestowe. Farewell. One, the most trifling, part of my duty remains undischarged. Accept this casket; startle not at its contents."

Rowena opened the small silver-chased casket, and perceived a carcanet, or necklace, with ear-jewels, of diamonds, which were obviously of immense value.

"It is impossible," she said, tendering back the casket. "I dare not accept a gift of such consequence."

"Yet keep it, lady," returned Rebecca. "You have power, rank, command, influence; we have wealth, the source both of our strength and weakness; the value of these toys, ten times multiplied, would not influence half so much as your slightest wish. To you, therefore, the gift is of little value; and to me, what I part with is of much less. Let me not think you deem so wretchedly ill of my nation as your commons believe. Think ye that I prize these sparkling fragments of stone above my liberty? or that my father values them in comparison to the honour of his only child? Accept them, lady—to me they are valueless. I will never wear jewels more."

"You are then unhappy!" said Rowena, struck with the manner in which Rebecca uttered the last words: "Oh, remain with us; the counsel of holy men will wean you from your erring law, and I will be a sister to you."

"No, lady," answered Rebecca, the same calm melancholy reigning in her soft voice and beautiful features; "that may not be. I may not change the faith of my fathers like a garment unsuited to the climate in which I seek to dwell; and unhappy, lady, I will not be. He to whom I dedicate my future life will be my comforter, if I do His will."

"Have you then convents, to one of which you mean to retire?" asked Rowena.

"No, lady," said the Jewess; "but among our people, since the time of Abraham downwards, have been women who have devoted their thoughts to Heaven, and their actions to works of kindness to men—tending the sick, feeding the hungry, and relieving the distressed. Among these will Rebecca be numbered. Say this to thy lord, should he chance to inquire after the fate of her whose life he saved."
There was an involuntary tremour on Rebecca’s voice, and a tenderness of accent, which perhaps betrayed more than she would willingly have expressed. She hastened to bid Rowena adieu.

“Farewell,” she said. “May He who made both Jew and Christian shower down on you His choicest blessings! The bark that wafts us hence will be under weigh ere we can reach the port.”

She glided from the apartment, leaving Rowena surprised as if a vision had passed before her. The fair Saxon related the singular conference to her husband, on whose mind it made a deep impression. He lived long and happily with Rowena, for they were attached to each other by the bonds of early affection, and they loved each other the more from the recollection of the obstacles which had impeded their union. Yet it would be inquiring too curiously to ask whether the recollection of Rebecca’s beauty and magnanimity did not recur to his mind more frequently than the fair descendant of Alfred might altogether have approved.1

Ivanhoe distinguished himself in the service of Richard, and was graced with farther marks of the royal favour. He might have risen still higher but for the premature death of the heroic Cœur-de-Lion, before the Castle of Chaluz, near Limoges.2 With the life of a generous, but rash and romantic, monarch perished all the projects which his ambition and his generosity had formed; to whom may be applied, with a slight alteration, the lines composed by Johnson for Charles of Sweden—

His fate was destined to a foreign strand,
A petty fortress and an “humble” hand;
He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.3

1 Recollection of Rebecca’s Beauty. The novelist Thackeray has written an amusing burlesque sequel to Ivanhoe, entitled Rebecca and Rowena.
2 Near Limoges. See Green’s Short History, Chap. II. Sec. IX.
3 Tale. From Johnson’s The Vanity of Human Wishes, a favorite poem with Scott.
APPENDIX

AUTHOR'S NOTES

NOTE A.—THE RANGER OF THE FOREST

A most sensible grievance of those aggrieved times were the forest Laws. These oppressive enactments were the produce of the Norman Conquest; for the Saxon laws of the chase were mild and humane, while those of William, enthusiastically attached to the exercise and its rights, were to the last degree tyrannical. The formation of the New Forest bears evidence to his passion for hunting, where he reduced many a happy village to the condition of that one commemorated by my friend, Mr. William Stewart Rose:

"Amongst the ruins of the church,
The midnight raven found a perch,
A melancholy place;
The ruthless Conqueror cast down,
Woe worth the deed, that little town,
To lengthen out his chase."

The disabling dogs, which might be necessary for keeping hocks and herds from running at the deer, was called lawing, and was in general use. The Charter of the Forest designed to lessen those evils, declares that inquisition, or view, for lawing dogs shall be made every third year, and shall be then done by the view and testimony of lawful men, not otherwise; and they whose dogs shall be then found unlawed, shall give three shillings for mercy, and for the future no man's ox shall be taken for lawing. Such lawing also shall be done by the assize commonly used, and which is, that three claws shall be cut off without the all of the right foot. (See on this subject the Historical Essay on the Magna Charta of King John—a most beautiful volume, by Richard Thomson.)

NOTE B.—NEGRO SLAVES

The severe accuracy of some critics has objected to the complexion of the slaves of Brian de Bois-Guibert, as being totally out of costume and propriety. I remember the same objection being made to a set of sable functionaries, whom my friend, Nat Lewis, introduced as the guards and mischief-doing satellites of the wicked Baron in his Castle Spectre. Mat treated the objection with great contempt, and averred in reply that he made the slaves black in order to obtain a striking effect of contrast, and that, could he have derived a similar advantage from making his heroine blue, blue she should have been.

I do not pretend to plead the immunities of my order so highly as this; but neither will I allow that the author of a modern antique romance is obliged to confine himself to the introdution of those manners only which can be proved to have absolutely existed in the times he is depicting, so that he restrain himself to such as are plausible and natural, and contain no obvious anachronism. In this point of view, what can be more natural than that the Templars, who, we know, copied closely the luxury of the Asiatic warriors with whom they fought, should use the service of the enslaved Africans, whom the fate of war transferred to new masters? I am sure, if there are no precise proofs of their having done so, there is nothing, on the other hand, that can entitle us positively to conclude that they never did; besides,
there is an instance in romance.

John of Rampayne, an excellent juggler and minstrel, under took to effect the escape of one Audulf de Bracy, by presenting himself in disguise at the court of the King, where he was con fined. For this purpose, “he stained his hair and his whole body entirely as black as jet, so that nothing was white but his teeth,” and succeeded in imposing himself on the King as an Ethiopian minstrel. He effected, by stratagem, the escape of the prisoner.
Negroes, therefore, must have been known in England in the dark ages.

NOTE C. — MINSTRELSY

The realm of France, it is well known, was divided betwixt the Norman and Teutonic race, who spoke the language in which the word “yes” is pronounced as oui, and the inhabitants of the Southern regions, whose speech, bearing some affinity to the Italian, pronounced the same word oc. The poets of the former race were called Minstrels, and their poems lays; those of the latter were termed Troubadours, and their compositions called sirventes, and other names. Richard, a professed admirer of the joyous science in all its branches, could imitate either the minstrel or troubadour. It is less likely that he should have been able to compose or sing an English ballad; yet so much do we wish to assimilate him of the Lion Heart to the band of warriors whom he led, that the anachronism, if there be one, may readily be forgiven.

NOTE D. — BATTLE OF STAMFORD

A great topographical blunder occurred here in former editions.
The bloody battle alluded to in the text, fought and won by King
Harold over his brother, the rebellious Tostil, and an exces force of Danes or Norsemen, was said in the text and a corre sponding note, to have taken place at Stamford, in Leicestersh and upon the river Welland. This is a mistake into which the author has been led by trusting to his memory, and so confounding two places of the same name. The Stamford, Strangford, or Staneford, at which the battle really was fought, is a ford upon the river Derwent, at the distance of about seven miles from York, and situated in that large and opulent county. A long wooden bridge over the Derwent, the site of which, with one remaining buttress, is still shown to the curious traveller, was furiously contested. One Norwegian long defended it by his single arm, and was at length pierced with a spear thrust through the planks of the bridge from a boat beneath.

The neighbourhood of Stamford, on the Derwent, contains some memorials of the battle. Horseshoes, swords, and the heads of halberds, or bills, are often found there; one place is called the Danes’ Well,” another the “Battle Flats.” From a tradition that the weapon with which the Norwegian champion was slain resembled a pear, or, as others say, that the trough or boat in which the soldier floated under the bridge to strike the blow had such a shape, the country people usually begin a great market, which is held at Stamford, with an entertainment called the Pear-pie feast, which, after all, may be a corruption of the Spear-pie feast. For more particulars, Drake’s History of York may be referred to. The author’s mistake was pointed out to him, in the most obliging manner, by Robert Belt, Esq., of Bossal House. The battle was fought in 1066.

Note E.—The Range of Iron Bars

This horrid species of torture may remind the reader of that to which the Spaniards subjected Guatimozin in order to extort discovery of his concealed wealth. But, in fact, an instance of similar barbarity is to be found nearer home, and occurs in the annals of Queen Mary’s time, containing so many other examples of atrocity.

[Sir Walter here proceeds to set forth in detail a narrative which he takes from the Journal of Bannatyne, secretary to John Knox, recounting “The Earl of Cassilis’ Tyranny against a Quick i. e., Living) Man.” The account describes a species of torture by roasting similar to that with which Front de Bouef threatens Isaac of York. He then adds:]

It appears by some papers in my possession that the officers or Country Keepers on the border were accustomed to torment their prisoners by binding them to the iron bars of their chimneys to extort confession.

Note F.—Heraldry

The author has been here upbraided with false heraldry, as having charged metal upon metal. It should be remembered, however, that heraldry had only its first rude origin during the crusade, and that all the minutiae of its fantastic science were the work of those who lived after the Reconquest.
of time, and introduced at a much later period. Those who think otherwise must suppose that the goddess of Armoiriers, like the goddess of Arms, sprung into the world completely equipped in all the gaudy trappings of the department she presides over.

In corroboration of what is above stated, it may be observed that the arms which were assumed by Godfrey of Boulogne himself, after the conquest of Jerusalem, was a cross counter paten cantoned with four little crosses, or upon a field azure, displaying thus metal upon metal. The heralds have tried to explain this undeniable fact in different modes; but Ferne gallantly contends, that a prince of Godfrey's qualities, should not be bound by the ordinary rules. The Scottish Nisbet, and the same Ferne, insist that the chiefs of the Crusade must have assigned to Godfrey this extraordinary and unwonted coat-of-arms, in order to induce those who should behold them to make enquiries; and hence give them the name of arma inquirenda. But with reference to these grave authorities, it seems unlikely that the assembled princes of Europe should have adjudged to Godfrey a coat armorial so much contrary to the general rule, if such rule had then existed. At any rate, it proves that metal upon metal, now accounted a solecism in heraldry, was admitted in other cases similar to that in the text. (See Ferne's Blazon of Gentrie, p. 238, edition 1586; Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i., p. 113, second edition.)

Note G.—Hedge-Priests

It is curious to observe, that in every state of society, some sort of ghostly consolation is provided for the members of the community, though assembled for purposes diametrically opposite to religion. A gang of beggars have their Patrico, and the bandits of the Apennines have among them persons acting as monks and priests, by whom they are confessed, and who perform mass before them. Unquestionably, such reverend persons, in such a society, must accommodate their manners and their morals to the community in which they live; and if they can occasionally obtain a degree of reverence for their supposed spiritual gifts, are, on most occasions, loaded with unmerciful ridicule, as possessing a character inconsistent with all around them.

Hence the fighting parson in the old play of Sir John Oldecastle, and the famous friar of Robin Hood's band. Nor were such characters ideal. There exists a monition of the Bishop of Durham against irregular churchmen of this class, who associated themselves with Border robbers, and desecrated the holiest offices of the priestly function by celebrating them for the benefit of thieves, robbers, and murderers, amongst ruins and in caverns of the earth, without regard to canonical form, and with torn and dirty attire, and maimed rites, altogether improper for the occasion.
INDEX OF WORDS ANNOTATED

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Agraffe</th>
<th>129</th>
<th>Borrows</th>
<th>443</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ahithophel</td>
<td>457</td>
<td>Botolph, St.</td>
<td>535</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alderman</td>
<td>134</td>
<td>Bow-hand</td>
<td>84</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anchoret</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>Bruit</td>
<td>395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A night</td>
<td>554</td>
<td>Bucklers</td>
<td>208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apollyon</td>
<td>323</td>
<td>Bull</td>
<td>360</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arbasteas</td>
<td>379</td>
<td>Bull-beggars</td>
<td>358</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arbor</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>Butt</td>
<td>395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Armadas</td>
<td>321</td>
<td>Byzants</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arrant</td>
<td>175</td>
<td>Cabalists</td>
<td>172</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arrêts</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>Caftaned</td>
<td>370</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asper</td>
<td>515</td>
<td>Caitiffs</td>
<td>360</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Assailzie</td>
<td>390</td>
<td>Can</td>
<td>441</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Attaint</td>
<td>142</td>
<td>Canary</td>
<td>239</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ave</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>Canon</td>
<td>80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Baldric</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>Canticles</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bandeau</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>Cap-a-pie</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barbed</td>
<td>161</td>
<td>Capital</td>
<td>473</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barbican</td>
<td>387</td>
<td>Capul</td>
<td>515</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barret-cap</td>
<td>588</td>
<td>Caracoled</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Basta</td>
<td>338</td>
<td>Cardeceu</td>
<td>438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Batoon</td>
<td>321</td>
<td>Cartel</td>
<td>324</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bauble</td>
<td>417</td>
<td>Casque</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bead</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>Centrical</td>
<td>202</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beau-seant</td>
<td>189</td>
<td>Certes</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beef</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>Chain</td>
<td>337</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beccaficoes</td>
<td>214</td>
<td>Chamfron</td>
<td>194</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belial</td>
<td>360</td>
<td>Chapter-houses</td>
<td>281</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benedicite</td>
<td>394</td>
<td>Chivalry</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bennet, St.</td>
<td>358</td>
<td>Churl</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benoni</td>
<td>516</td>
<td>Cistercian</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beschrew</td>
<td>101</td>
<td>Clerk</td>
<td>237</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Biggin</td>
<td>354</td>
<td>Clout</td>
<td>206</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bills</td>
<td>94</td>
<td>Cockleshells</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Black-letter</td>
<td>563</td>
<td>Cockscomb</td>
<td>283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Blotch</td>
<td>186</td>
<td>Collop</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tolst</td>
<td>169</td>
<td>Commanderies</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bonnet</td>
<td>362</td>
<td>Condottieri</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INDEX OF WORDS ANNOTATED

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Word</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Congee</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cope</td>
<td>80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coping stones</td>
<td>409</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corselet</td>
<td>236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Counterpoise</td>
<td>408</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cowkeeper</td>
<td>267</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Credo</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crest</td>
<td>318</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cri-de-guerre</td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crook</td>
<td>330</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crowd</td>
<td>585</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crowder</td>
<td>301</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crown</td>
<td>327</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cuff</td>
<td>436</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Curée</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Curfew</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Curtal</td>
<td>423</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danelagh</td>
<td>210</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danger</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danish</td>
<td>210</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>De facto</td>
<td>606</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delict</td>
<td>489</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deliver</td>
<td>469</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Demi-courbette</td>
<td>418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Demi-volte</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Derring do</td>
<td>389</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Derry-down</td>
<td>246</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Derwent</td>
<td>283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Despardieux</td>
<td>315</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Destrier</td>
<td>538</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Device</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Devoir</td>
<td>513</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Doit</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Donative</td>
<td>156</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Doncaster</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Doom</td>
<td>599</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dortour</td>
<td>450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Drench</td>
<td>417</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Druidical</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dunghills</td>
<td>583</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ecclesiastica</td>
<td>316</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>El Jerrid</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Emir</td>
<td>474</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>En avant</td>
<td>385</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>En croupe</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Equerry</td>
<td>550</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Errant</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Escutcheon</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Esne</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Esoine</td>
<td>518</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Estrada</td>
<td>168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fauns</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fetterlock</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fief</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flints</td>
<td>589</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flitch</td>
<td>483</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flox-silk</td>
<td>214</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Folkfree</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Forbode</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fortalice</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fosse</td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fox-earths</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Francis, St.</td>
<td>380</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Franklin</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Front-de Bœuf</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gaberdine</td>
<td>166</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gammon</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gear</td>
<td>336, 436</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Genil</td>
<td>515</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Glaive</td>
<td>255</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gorget</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grace-cup</td>
<td>100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gramercy</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guild</td>
<td>173</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guilder</td>
<td>170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gymmal ring</td>
<td>440</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gyves</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hacqueton</td>
<td>361</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Halfling</td>
<td>100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Halidom</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Harrying</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hatchment</td>
<td>391</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hauberk</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hedgepriest</td>
<td>453</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heptarchy</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hereward</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hership</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hide</td>
<td>425</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hilding</td>
<td>363</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hinds</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Houris</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hutch</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ifrin</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Term</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ognito</td>
<td>161</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>osts</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nettle</td>
<td>75, 223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>My</td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>etc</td>
<td>614</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Indexes</td>
<td>320</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sageses</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>My brother</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reguer</td>
<td>379</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tech</td>
<td>250</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A-gage</td>
<td>536</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Man</td>
<td>438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vin-fire</td>
<td>434</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ward</td>
<td>424</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ts</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Emerger</td>
<td>250</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Red</td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Archer</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ccabeus</td>
<td>392</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ce</td>
<td>187</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hound</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jor-domo</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lapert</td>
<td>395</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lison</td>
<td>425</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ivoisie</td>
<td>352</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mmocks</td>
<td>331</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nciple</td>
<td>539</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ncues</td>
<td>519</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ngonel</td>
<td>349</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ntelels</td>
<td>361</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ravedi</td>
<td>450</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rks</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roquin</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rry</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>St</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lée</td>
<td>390</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ill</td>
<td>436</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sal</td>
<td>234</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>At</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iety</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rat</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rrion</td>
<td>547</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ris-dancer</td>
<td>441</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ree</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Recheate</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Murrain</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muscadine</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nathless</td>
<td>369</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nidering</td>
<td>217, 574</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nobles</td>
<td>204</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nombres</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nonce</td>
<td>331</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nook</td>
<td>242</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Noons</td>
<td>247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Odin</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orders</td>
<td>336</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orient</td>
<td>314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orisons</td>
<td>111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oublette</td>
<td>576</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Out-hereding</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Outrance</td>
<td>137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Outrecudence</td>
<td>159, 353</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oyez</td>
<td>591</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palfrey</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palmer</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Partizan</td>
<td>275</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pater Noster</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pentecost</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Penthouse</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Periaps</td>
<td>481</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pigment</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pinfold</td>
<td>236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pitch</td>
<td>151</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Plate</td>
<td>76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Points</td>
<td>273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pork</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Postern</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pouncet-box</td>
<td>440</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Preceptory</td>
<td>316</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Primes</td>
<td>247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prior</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Propined</td>
<td>429</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pursuivants</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pyet</td>
<td>438</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pyx</td>
<td>443</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quarter-staff</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quean</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rascaille</td>
<td>236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Real</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

INDEX OF WORDS ANNOTATED
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Word</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Refectories</td>
<td>281</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reliquary</td>
<td>86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rere-supper</td>
<td>252</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rest</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rheno</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Riding</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rollo</td>
<td>349</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romants</td>
<td>474</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rood</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rotes</td>
<td>565</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rovers</td>
<td>204</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Runagate</td>
<td>206</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sabaoths</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sack</td>
<td>273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sacless</td>
<td>425</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sacring-bell</td>
<td>586</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sally-port</td>
<td>352</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Salvage</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sanctuary</td>
<td>460</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scald</td>
<td>419</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scallop</td>
<td>349</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scot-free</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scrip</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>See</td>
<td>360</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Seneschals</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sewer</td>
<td>285</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sigils</td>
<td>481</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Simarre</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sinnel</td>
<td>213</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sirrah</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sirvente</td>
<td>614</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slow-hound (Slot-hound)</td>
<td>73, 376</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Solere chamber</td>
<td>102</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sortileges</td>
<td>496</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Soul-scot</td>
<td>429</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Springal</td>
<td>193</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Squires</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stede</td>
<td>442</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stentorian</td>
<td>379</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strike</td>
<td>555</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sumpter</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Surquedy</td>
<td>353</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Termagaunt</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thane</td>
<td>72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Theow</td>
<td>425</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thor</td>
<td>340</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thrall</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Toll-dish</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tongs</td>
<td>247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Totty</td>
<td>434</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tournament</td>
<td>77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Train</td>
<td>310</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transmew</td>
<td>273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tregotour</td>
<td>579</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trivet</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Troubadour</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Truss</td>
<td>273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uncle</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Underlies</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unshriven</td>
<td>399</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Urus</td>
<td>240</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vair</td>
<td>473</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Varlet</td>
<td>165</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vassalage</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Veal</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Venerie</td>
<td>442</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vert</td>
<td>554</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vespers</td>
<td>247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Villains</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Virelai</td>
<td>542</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vizard</td>
<td>286</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vulnerary</td>
<td>367</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wantley</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Warders</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wassail</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wastel</td>
<td>213</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Watling</td>
<td>290</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White Horse</td>
<td>504</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whittle</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wicket</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wimple</td>
<td>570</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Witenagemotes</td>
<td>357</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wittol</td>
<td>298</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woden</td>
<td>347</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wet</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yeomanry</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zecchinas</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zernebock</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
THE BORROWER WILL BE CHARGED AN OVERDUE FEE IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW. NON-RECEIPT OF OVERDUE NOTICES DOES NOT EXEMPT THE BORROWER FROM OVERDUE FEES.